SOLICITOR FOR CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15096) to appoint a solicitor for the customs department of the Treasury, and that the same be considered at the present time. I ask that the Clerk read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney-General shall, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint a customs solicitor and such assistants not to exceed three, as the Secretary may deem necessary to protect the interests of the United States in all cases and matters before the Board of General Appraisers; and the said solicitor and his assistants shall, whenever so directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, appear in the courts of the United States in any cases appealed from said Board of General Appraisers and take such part in the management, conduct, and trial of such cases as the Attorney-General may deem advisable.

SEC. 2. That the salary of said solicitor shall be $5,000 per annum, and of said assistants not to exceed $3,000 per annum, to be fixed by the Attorney-General, and all of said salaries shall be paid out of the general appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

SEC. 3. That said solicitor and assistants shall be appointed without compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service," approved January 16, 1883, and amendments thereof.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. I will explain the bill to the gentleman in a moment. The bill is recommended unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means. At present under the law passed in 1895 the Attorney-General is authorized to appoint an assistant to take charge of the customs cases before the general board of appraisers at a salary of $3,500 a year. When the case goes from the board of appraisers to the court it is taken charge of by an assistant district attorney of New York who knows nothing about the case or the history of it. This bill authorizes the appointment of a solicitor of customs who is familiar with cases and will follow the cases through the court on appeal. That is the first section of the bill. It also authorizes the appointment of three assistants at $3,500 each. Now, these assistants are appointed under the civil service law, and detailed for that purpose. The gentleman can see the embarrassment that ensues in trying to get attorneys appointed under the civil service. The bill makes an annual increase of expenditure of $3,000 a year, but it requires the attorneys to take charge of the cases on appeal, and it is done by a lawyer who is familiar with the facts of all the cases before the appraisers.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to object to the bill, but I want to inquire what effect it would have on a subject of which we have heard considerable discussion as to the amount of fees collected by the district attorney for the southern district of New York.

Mr. PAYNE. My recollection is that that was cured by salary instead of fees. This bill does not give the solicitor fees, but gives him a salary.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wanted to inquire whether there was a provision in this bill which would repeal or affect the law with reference to the district attorney for the southern district of New York.

Mr. PAYNE. I should say not.

Mr. BARTLETT. You are providing here for special officers to look after these cases with salaries which I do not think are extravagant, but the attorney for the southern district of New York ought not to be left a salary or fees for doing this work which you are giving to solicitors to do on a salary. I do not know whether this covers that or not.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think there will be any trouble about that if this bill is passed. The solicitor will take charge of the cases.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not the class of cases out of which the district attorney receives fees, if I recollect.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is correct; it does not affect that class of cases at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offered an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert a new section after section 3, to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the provision in relation to the employment of counsel in customs cases under section 1 of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895,' etc., approved March 2, 1895, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

"Renumber section 4, to be section 5."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York as to the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. The purpose of the amendment is to repeal a provision in an appropriation bill that now provides the Attorney-General may employ counsel before the board. This new office is to take the place of that counsel, and I wanted to be sure to cut off that other officer. That is the only object of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The substitute amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the last two bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Mr. NELSON presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of East Grand Forks, Winona, Melrose, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Austin, Two Harbors, Detroit, Virginia, Montevideo, all in the State of Minnesota, and of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLEE presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Wilmington and Chester, in the State of Delaware, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURNHAM presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Manchester and Concord, N. H., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Municipal Art Society of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a national advisory board of experts on art; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KNOX presented memorials of Lodge No. 62, Brotherhood of Firemen, of Carbondale; Lodge No. 378, Brotherhood of Firemen, of McKees Rocks; Division No. 200, Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, of Bradford; Division No. 314, Order of Railway Conductors, of Allegheny; Iron City Division, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Pittsburg; Lodge No. 258, Brotherhood of Trainmen, of East Brady; Division No. 464, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Pittsburg; Division No. 281, Order of Railway Conductors, of Pittsburg; sundry employees of the Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad Company, of Pittsburg; firemen of Philadelphia and Reading Railway, of Philadelphia; Division No. 610, Brotherhood of Trainmen, of Norristown; Division No. 467, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Tyrone; Division No. 51, Order of Railway Conductors, of Tyrone; Lodge No. 632, Brotherhood of Trainmen, of Dickerson Run; Lodge No. 465, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, of Allegheny; Lodge No. 665, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Pottstown; Lodge No. 378, Brotherhood of Trainmen, of Allegheny; Division No. 104, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Columbia; Division No. 23, Order of Railway Conductors, of Tamaqua; Division No. 466, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Bellwood; Division No. 380, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Sayre; Division No. 75, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Reading; Division No. 293, Brotherhood of Engineers, of Allegheny; Division No. 172, Order of Railway Conductors, of Conemaugh; Order of Railway Conductors, of Clarks Summit; Lodge No. 337, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Sayre, and Lodge No. 638, Brotherhood of Firemen, of Clearfield, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the rate bill prohibiting the issuing of passes to railroad employees and members of their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Conemaugh, Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Reading, Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Pittsburg, and Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of Altoona, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the rate bill prohibiting the issuing of passes to secretaries of Railroad Young Men's Christian Associations; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEAN presented a memorial of Elizabeth Division, No. 688, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Elizabeth, N. J., and a memorial of Local Division No. 294, Order of Railway Conductors, of Trenton, N. J., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Lewis T. Stevens, of Cape May, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the postal laws relating to newspaper subscriptions; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry pupils of the high school of Hoboken, N. J., praying for the ratification of international arbitration treaties; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Park Avenue Church, of East Orange, N. J., remonstrating against the transfer of the education and care of the Indians and Eskimos in Alaska from the United States Bureau of Education to the governor of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also (for Mr. DRYDEN) presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Trenton, High Bridge, Hoboken, and Jersey City, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. PLATT) presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Sidney, New York City, Mechanicsville, Middletown, Syracuse, Norwich, Watertown, Ogdensburg, and St. George, Staten Island, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PERKINS presented sundry memorials from railroad employees of Truckee, Los Angeles, and Sacramento, all in the State of California, and of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MALLORY presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Jacksonville and Pensacola, in the State of Florida, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of H. E. Helm, of St. Augustine, Fla., secretary of the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association, remonstrating against the exclusion of secretaries of the association from the privilege of railroad passes, as provided in the conference report on the rate bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Madison, Ashland, Portage, Antigo, Fond du Lac, Ellis Junction, and Green Bay, all in the State of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I take it that I have received, as all other Senators have, telegrams of the same character and about the same number, but they have all been addressed to me. Consequently I have not deemed it necessary to present them to the Senate. They are not in the form of petitions, but they are an appeal to the Senator to whom they are addressed. I make this explanation, because having received them those who sent them finding no record might think I had not presented to the Senate their petitions. I do not regard them as a petition to the Senate, but a request of me. Consequently I do not put them in the RECORD.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the same question came into my mind, not only on this occasion, but on other occasions, and I have always thought that the Senate was entitled to whatever a Senator received in that way connected with the business of the Senate. Therefore, after making inquiry and finding that everybody else was in some doubt as to what should be done, but that all seemed to think it proper to file them, I have been, as a rule, filing such telegrams.

I send now to the desk a number of telegrams from railroad employees protesting against being denied passes over their railroads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. FORAKER presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Cincinnati, Van Wert, Chicago Junction, Dennison, Painesville, Cleveland, Toledo, Galion, Marion, and Middleport, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAILEY. I think there is no more sacred right in this Government than the right of petition, and I should be the last one to ignore or disregard it. But it does seem to me it is not placing the right of petition on precisely the high plane to which it is entitled if every time a constituent writes us a letter or sends us a telegram about a measure we deemed it necessary to present it as we would a petition. That being my view, those that come to me as a Senator I shall not deem it my duty to put in the RECORD; but when my constituents, if only a single one, would transmit through me a petition to the Senate I would be very careful to file it.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean to have the Senator infer that I would advocate that every time a Senator received a letter or a single telegram it should be presented here as though it were a petition; but in unusual cases like we now have presented, where telegrams are coming from all over the country, they are sent to their immediate representatives as a rule, and I think they are intended as in the nature of petitions. I would not think that it was any violation of the rule of presenting petitions to treat these as such and present them. I would be very glad to have the benefit of what come to the Senator from Texas. I would like to have them in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. In common with other Senators, I have received numerous telegrams, some in behalf, as they have represented, of thousands of people. I have thought that the proper disposition of them would be to send them to the committee of conference, and that is what I propose to do with mine.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have had like telegrams coming to me for several days, but nearly all of them come from an organization and come as a protest against certain contemplated legislation. That being so, I do not see any difference whether they come in the form of a protest signed by the secretary of an organization or in the form of a petition. The effect of it is a petition to Congress against the enactment of certain legislation. It seems to me, that being the case, that it is proper to file them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be received.

Mr. MCCUMBER presented a memorial of Local Division No. 279, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Dickinson, N. Dak., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to railroad employees and their families; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented a memorial of the Order of Railway Conductors of Rawlins, Wyo., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to railroad employees and their families; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Freeport, Chicago, Mendota, Bloomington, Salem, Clinton, and Beardstown, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCOTT presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Huntington, Bluefield, and Hinton, all in the State of West Virginia, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DICK presented a memorial of Maple City Division, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Painesville, Ohio, and a memorial of E. M. Redhead, secretary of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Chicago Junction, Ohio, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLARD presented sundry memorials of railroad employees of Alliance, South Omaha, Omaha, Chadron, Norfolk, Lincoln, and Grand Island, all in the State of Nebraska, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLARD. I present a telegram from the president of the Santa Fe road, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., June 5, 1906.

Hon. J. H. MILLARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

While in full sympathy with prohibition of free passes in general, the bill as amended in conference imposes great hardship on lower grades of employees, and will create much trouble; also we must move large numbers of laborers over long distances. They have no money, nor would it be safe to furnish them with amount necessary to pay fare. Provision should certainly be made for free transportation for our own officers and men and members of their families; otherwise great burden imposed on us without benefit to anyone.

E. P. RIPLEY,
President of Santa Fe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. ANKENY. I present a number of telegrams, and ask that the one pinned on top may be read. They are all about alike.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington presents certain telegrams, and asks that one be read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the reading of these telegrams, but they are all of the same general import. I have here in my hand several hundred of them. It seems to me that it is a useless consumption of the time of the Senate to read them. If that, however, is to be done, I shall ask for the reading of some of these.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the telegram sent to the desk by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TILLMAN. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ANKENY presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Ellensburg and Seattle, Wash., and of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Fort Dodge, Stuart, Boone, Valley Junction, Creston, Clarion, Ottumwa, and Cherokee, all in the State of Iowa, and of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PETTUS presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Montgomery, Athens, Fayette, Tuscumbia, Gadsden, Anniston, Birmingham, Mobile, Selma, Greensboro, Opelika, Marion, Plantersville, Meridian, Sheffield, Tuscaloosa, Montevale, Camden, Grove Hill, Marion Junction, and Columbiana Depot, all in the State of Alabama, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. During my absence at the Military Academy, as a member of the Board of Visitors for the Senate, my colleague [Mr. MCCREARY] presented a good many telegrams of the general nature of those just read at the desk, for which I am obliged. I was disposed to take the view expressed by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and treat these telegrams as individual communications rather than as petitions to Congress. But as the contrary view seems to prevail, it occurs to me but proper that I should ask to make an additional submission of one or two hundred telegrams that I have in my hand, all to the same purport, protesting against the conclusion reached in the conference report as to the section touching the question of free passes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of the State of Kentucky, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAYNER presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Baltimore and Kensington, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Montana presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Glendive, Whitefish, and Livingston, all in the State of Montana, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCCREARY. I present in addition to those presented yesterday morning other telegrams from railroad employees and from various brotherhoods of locomotive engineers, protesting against the report of the railroad rate bill relative to issuing passes to employees of railroads and their families. I ask that the memorials may lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. MCCREARY presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Ludlow, Somerset, Fulton, Winchester, and Paducah, all in the State of Kentucky, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested a moment ago that I thought the proper place to send these telegrams was to the committee of conference, but as a different order seems to prevail, I send a portion of the telegrams that have come to me to the desk for reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. GALLINGER presented sundry memorials of railroad employees of Concord, Woodville, Nashua, and Lakeport, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask that a reference be changed. By inadvertence the bill (H. R. 18024) for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Bills, petitions, and all matters concerning that question have been before the Committee on Foreign Relations, because the question involves international relations. I ask that the reference be changed, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reference was made to the Committee on Commerce at the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir. Ordinarily the bill would go to the Committee on Commerce, and I think that is the proper place for it; but I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts that, prior to the bill coming from the House, this subject-matter had been committed by the Senate to the committee of which he is a member, and that for that reason he is desirous of having the change made.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator well knows, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is upon the Committee on Foreign Relations, and he is aware that a similar bill has been before the latter committee, and it has necessarily been before that committee. The bill provides in one of its sections for the opening of negotiations with a foreign government, which has always been submitted, of course, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Commerce will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BACON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5345) for the relief of L. Biertempfel, have instructed me to report it back, together with an amendment in lieu thereof proposing to appropriate $871.08 to reimburse L. Biertempfel for loss sustained by him through the action of the United States commercial agent at Bamberg, Germany, etc., which they recommend be placed upon the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill now before the committee, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill, with the proposed amendment, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 28th ultimo, proposing to appropriate $1,983.06 to pay the claim of Durham W. Stevens as chargé d'affaires ad interim at Tokyo from October 25, 1878, to May 21, 1879, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, submitted a favorable report thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS IN MONTANA.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. The matter embraced in the substitute has passed the Senate twice, once in the Indian appropriation bill and again last Saturday.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and he is hereby directed to immediately cause to be surveyed all of the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana.

SEC. 2. That so soon as all the lands embraced within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations and may rightfully belong on said reservation: Provided, That all water rights and privileges on or connected with streams within or adjoining said reservation shall be subject to the laws of the State of Montana: And provided further, That there shall be allotted to each adult or head of family 80 acres of irrigable land and 240 acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, or at the option of the allottee the entire 320 acres may be taken in land valuable only for grazing purposes, and to each person under 18 years of age one-half of such acreage, respectively: Provided further, That the Holy Family Mission on Two Medicine Creek is hereby granted 320 acres of land, to be selected by the authorities of said mission, embracing the mission buildings and improvements thereon, and the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary or desirable for agency, school, and religious purposes; also such tract or tracts of grazing and timber lands as he may deem expedient for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation in common; but such reserved lands, or any part thereof, may be disposed of from time to time in such manner as the said Secretary may determine.

SEC. 3. That upon the completion of said allotments the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of the said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior or otherwise disposed of; said commission to be constituted as follows: One commissioner shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians and the other two resident citizens of the State of Montana.

That within thirty days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. Said commission is hereby empowered to select a clerk at a salary of not to exceed $5 per day.

That said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, by the smallest legal subdivisions of 40 acres each, all of the remaining lands embraced within said reservation. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land; and fifth, mineral lands: Provided, That mineral lands shall not be appraised.

That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands; such inspection and classification to be completed within nine months from the date of the organization of said commission.

SEC. 4. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the land shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead, mineral, and town-site laws of the United States, except such of said lands as shall have been classified as timber lands, and except such sections 16 and 36 of each township, or any part thereof, for which the State of Montana has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws, which sections, or parts thereof, are hereby granted to the State of Montana for school purposes. And in case either of said sections or parts thereof is lost to the State of Montana by reason of allotment thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other lands not occupied or reserved within said reservation, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which selections shall be made prior to the opening of the lands to settlement: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the said Indians for the lands in said sections 16 and 36, so granted, or the lands within said reservation selected in lieu thereof, the sum of $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 5. That the lands so classified and appraised shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged, but no entry shall be allowed under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes: Provided further, That the price of said lands shall be the appraised value thereof as fixed by said commission, which in no case shall be less than $1.25 per acre for agricultural and grazing lands and $5 per acre for timber lands; but settlers under the homestead law who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law shall pay one-fifth of the appraised value in cash at the time of entry and the remainder in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and when the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence, and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That he shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within seven years from date of entry, and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such entrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must receive their full naturalization papers: And provided further, That the fees and commissions at the time of commutation or final entry shall be the same as are now provided by law where the price of land is $1.25 per acre: Provided, That if any entryman fails to make such payments, or any of them, within the time stated, or to make final proof within seven years from date of entry, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall at once cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry shall be forfeited and canceled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed by said commission, receiving credit for payments previously made.

SEC. 6. That if, after the approval of the classification and appraisement, as provided herein, there shall be found lands within the limits of the reservation under irrigation projects deemed practicable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the "reclamation act," said lands shall be subject to withdrawal and be disposed of under the provisions of said act, and settlers shall pay, in addition to the cost of construction and maintenance provided therein, the appraised value, as provided in this act, into the reclamation funds: And provided further, That all lands hereby opened to settlement remaining undisposed of at the end of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than $1.25 per acre, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and any lands remaining unsold ten years after said lands shall have been opened to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, without regard to the minimum limit above stated: Provided, That not more than 160 acres of land shall be sold to any one person or company.

SEC. 7. That the lands within said reservation not already previously entered, whether classified as agricultural, grazing, or timber lands, shall be subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the general provisions of the United States mineral and coal land laws, at the prices therein fixed, except that no mineral or coal exploration, location, or purchase shall be permitted upon any lands allotted to an Indian.

SEC. 8. That lands classified and returned by said commission as timber lands shall be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under sealed bids, to the highest bidder, for cash, at not less than $5 per acre, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the said timber lands shall be sold in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, with preference right of purchase to actual settlers, including Indian allottees residing in the vicinity, at the highest price bid.

SEC. 9. That after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification, appraisement, and sale of lands, and such other incidental expenses as shall have been necessarily incurred, including the cost of survey of said lands, the balance realized from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said Indian tribe. Not exceeding one-third of the total amount thus deposited in the Treasury, together with one-third of the amount of the principal of all other funds now placed to the credit of or which is due said tribe of Indians from all sources, shall be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior as he may deem advisable for the benefit of said Indians, in the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, the purchase of stock cattle, horses, and farming implements, and in their education and civilization. The remainder of all funds deposited in the Treasury, realized from such sale of lands herein authorized, together with the remainder of all other funds now placed to the credit of or that shall hereafter become due to said tribe of Indians, shall, upon the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the allotments of land authorized by this act, be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, the persons entitled to share as members in such distribution to be determined by said Secretary; the funds thus allotted and apportioned shall be placed to the credit of such individuals upon the books of the United States Treasury for the benefit of such allottees, their legatees, or heirs. The President may, by Executive order, from time to time order the distribution and payment of such funds or the interest accruing therefrom to such individual members of the tribe as, in his judgment, would be for the best interest of such individuals to have such distribution made, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe therefor: Provided, That so long as the United States shall hold the funds as trustee for any member of the tribe, the Indian beneficiary shall be paid interest thereon annually at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

SEC. 10. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $65,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of Montana and for lands reserved for agency and school purposes, at the rate of $1.25 per acre; also the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, classify, and appraise the lands of said reservation as provided herein, and also to defray the expense of the appraisement and survey of said town sites, the latter sums to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

SEC. 11. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any part of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36 or the equivalent in each township that may be granted to the State of Montana, the reserved tracts hereinbefore mentioned for agency and school purposes, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any part thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, not less than 80 acres of said land at or near the present settlements of Browning and Babb, and each of such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlements. Such town sites shall be surveyed, appraised, and disposed of as provided in section 2381 of the United States Revised Statutes: Provided, That any person who, at the date when the appraisers commence their work upon the land, shall be an actual resident upon any one such lot and the owner of substantial and permanent improvements thereon, and who shall maintain his or her residence and improvements on such lot to the date of his or her application to enter, shall be entitled to enter at any time prior to the day fixed for the public sale, and at the appraised value thereof, such lot and any one additional lot of which he or she may also be in possession and upon which he or she may have substantial and permanent improvements: Provided further, That before making entry of any such lot or lots, the applicant shall make proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the land lies of such residence, possession, and ownership of improvements, under such regulations as to time, notice, manner, and character of proof as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That in making their appraisal of the lots so surveyed it shall be the duty of the appraisers to ascertain the names of the residents upon and occupants of any such lots, the character and extent of the improvements thereon, and the name of the reputed owner thereof, and to report their findings in connection with their report of appraisal, which report of findings shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts therein set out. All such lots not so entered prior to the day fixed for the public sale shall be offered at public outcry in their regular order with the other unimproved and unoccupied lots: Provided, however, That no lot shall be sold for less than $10: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed shall approximate 50 by 150 feet in size.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ISLE OF PINES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask permission to have Senate resolution 103 go over with its present privileges, because I understand that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] intends to press the consideration of the conference report on the rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CASES CONDUCTED BY OFFICERS OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2969) to authorize the Attorney-General and certain other officers of the Department of Justice and special assistants and counsel to begin and conduct legal proceedings in any courts of the United States and before any commission or commissioner or quasi judicial body created under the laws of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, the Assistant to the Attorney-General, the Assistant Attorneys-General, special assistants to the Attorney-General, special assistants to the district attorneys, and special counsel appointed under any provision of law to begin and conduct any kind of legal proceedings, civil or criminal, in any court of any judicial district, or before any commission or commissioner or quasi-judicial body created under the laws of the United States, including grand jury proceedings, whether they reside in the judicial district where such proceedings are brought or not. But all such proceedings shall be begun and conducted by such officials, attorneys, and counsel only under the direction, supervision, and control of the Attorney-General.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to have the Senator presenting the bill give a little explanation of the reason for the legislation.

Mr. KNOX. I ask that the report upon the bill, which is less than half a page, be read. It is the most succinct statement of the purpose of the bill I could possibly suggest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. KNOX, May 28, 1906, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2969) authorizing the Attorney-General and certain other officers of the Department of Justice to conduct legal proceedings in any court of the United States, having considered the same, report the bill favorably without amendment.

It is frequently desirable and even necessary that the Attorney-General should detail an officer of his Department to assist some United States attorney in the investigation and prosecution of cases of unusual importance or interest, or to make an independent investigation and report the result to the Department, and, if necessary, to prosecute the same; or, where this latter is impracticable, to appoint a special assistant to the Attorney-General, or special counsel to act independently of the United States attorney, particularly in criminal matters.

In 1903 the Attorney-General appointed a special assistant to investigate and report in the Japanese silk fraud cases, and it was held (121 Fed. Rep., 826, U. S. v. Rosenthal) that a special assistant to the Attorney-General is not an officer of the Department of Justice under sections 359 and 367, Revised Statutes, or other provisions of the United States Statutes, and the indictment was quashed because of the presence of this attorney in the grand jury room. That case further holds that neither the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, nor any officer of the Department has the power to conduct or aid in the conduct of proceedings before a grand jury. It is clearly of great importance that they should have this power.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHILD LABOR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17838) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia. It is a very important measure, and we desire to get it into conference.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the bill excite any debate?

Mr. DUBOIS. None whatever, I think. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to the Senator, but I can not yield to anyone else.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am quite sure it will not lead to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The proposed substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That no child under 14 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any factory, workshop, mercantile establishment, store, business office, telegraph office, restaurant, hotel, apartment house, theater, bowling alley, or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages, or selling newspapers. No such child shall be employed in any work performed for wages or other compensation, to whomsoever payable, during the hours when the public schools of the District of Columbia are in session, nor before the hour of 6 o'clock in the morning or after the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening.

SEC. 2. That no child under 16 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any of the establishments named in section 1, unless the person or corporation employing him procures and keeps on file and accessible to the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia an age and schooling certificate, and keeps two complete lists of all such children employed therein, one on file and one conspicuously posted near the principal entrance of the building in which such children are employed.

SEC. 3. That an age and schooling certificate shall be approved only by the superintendent of public schools, or by a person authorized by him in writing, who shall have authority to administer the oath provided for therein, but no fee shall be charged therefor.

SEC. 4. That an age and schooling certificate shall not be approved unless satisfactory evidence is furnished by duly attested transcript of the certificate of birth or baptism of such child, or other religious record, or the register of birth or the affidavit of the parent or guardian or custodian of a child, which affidavit shall be required, however, only in case such last-mentioned transcript of the certificate of birth be not procured and filed, showing the place and date of birth of such child, which affidavit must be taken before the officer issuing the employment certificate, who is hereby authorized and required to administer such oath, and who shall not demand or receive a fee therefor.

SEC. 5. That the age and schooling certificate of a child under 16 years of age shall be in the following form:

AGE AND SCHOOLING CERTIFICATE.

This certifies that I am the (father, mother, guardian, or custodian) of (name of child) ——— ——— and that (he or she) was born at (name of town or city) ———, in the county (name of county, if known) ——— and State (or country) of ———, on the (day and year of birth) ———, and is now (number of years and months) ——— old.

Signature of (father, mother, guardian, or custodian).

(Date.)

There personally appeared before me the above-named (name of person signing) ——— ——— and made oath that the foregoing certificate by (him or her) signed is true to the best of (his or her) knowledge and belief. I hereby approve the foregoing certificate of (name of child) ——— ———, height (feet and inches) ———, eyes (color) ———, complexion (fair or dark) ———, hair (color) ———, having no sufficient reason to doubt that (he or she) is of the age therein certified, I hereby certify that (he or she) can read at sight and can write legibly simple sentences in the English language, and that (he or she) has reached the normal development of a child of (his or her) age, and is in sound health and is physically able to perform the work which (he or she) intends to do, and that (he or she) has regularly attended the public schools, or a school equivalent thereto, for not less than one hundred and thirty days during the school year previous to arriving at the age of 14 years, or during the year previous to applying for such school record, and has received during such period instruction in reading, spelling, writing, English grammar, and geography, and is familiar with the fundamental operations of arithmetic to and including fractions.

This certificate belongs to (name of child in whose behalf it is drawn) ——— ——— and is to be surrendered to (him or her) whenever (he or she) leaves the service of the corporation or employer holding the same; but if not claimed by said child within thirty days from such time it shall be returned to the superintendent of schools.

A duplicate of each age and schooling certificate shall be filed out and kept on file by the superintendent of public schools. Any explanatory matter may be printed with such certificate, in the discretion of said superintendent.

SEC. 6. That whoever employs a child under 16 years of age, and whoever having under his control a child under such age permits such child to be employed, in violation of sections 1, 2, 8, or 9 of this act shall, for such offense, be fined not more than $50; and whoever continues to employ any child in violation of any of said sections of this act, after being notified by an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, shall for every day thereafter that such employment continues be fined not less than $5 nor more than $20. A failure to produce to an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, any age or schooling certificate or list required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of illegal employment of any person whose age and schooling certificate is not produced or whose name is not so listed. Any corporation or employer retaining any age and schooling certificate in violation of section 5 of this act shall be fined $10. Every person authorized to sign the certificate prescribed by section 5 of this act who knowingly certifies to any materially false statement therein shall be fined not more than $50.

SEC. 7. That inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia may visit the factories, workshops, and mercantile establishments in the District of Columbia and ascertain whether any minors are employed therein contrary to the provisions of this act, and they shall report any cases of such illegal employment to the superintendent of public schools and the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia. Inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia may require that the age and schooling certificates and lists provided for in this act of minors employed in such factories, workshops, or mercantile establishments shall be produced for their inspection.

SEC. 8. That no minor under 16 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in any manufacturing, mechanical, or mercantile establishment more than eight hours in any one day, or before the hour of 6 o'clock a. m., or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., and in no case shall the number of hours exceed forty-eight in a week.

SEC. 9. That every employer shall post in a conspicuous place in every room where such persons are employed a printed notice, stating the number of hours required of them on each day of the week, the hours of commencing and stopping work, and the hours when the time or times allowed for dinner or for other meals begin and end. The printed form of such notice shall be furnished by the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia, and the employment of any such person for a longer time in any day than that so stated shall be deemed a violation of this section.

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint two inspectors to carry out the purposes of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 each per annum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I discovered in listening to some of the provisions of the bill that it is a very remarkable measure. It seeks to take charge entirely of the younger population of the District and subject them to certain restrictions in the way of employment, which, it seems to me, is a very great step beyond anything that has ever been applied to conditions here in the District.

It is not, Mr. President, a bill regulating child labor, because I think everybody realizes that there may be proper statutes and regulations affecting child labor; but as I listened to the bill it seemed to me that in any case where a widowed mother has a bright boy helping her to maintain her family and glad to help her to maintain a home and the family relations, if he is below the age of 16 he is searched out by Government inspectors, and he is told and the mother is told that instead of contributing, as young boys and young girls do, to family expenses and family needs, he shall be taken from his vocation and shall be put to school willy nilly. It is a step in the direction to which I have called, and other Senators have called, the attention of the Senate, of the Government assuming the control and management here of the domestic relations.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. I have known a great many cases——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Maine that evidently this bill will excite discussion, and that he object to its consideration and let us get on to something else. It is evident that it can not pass this morning without debate.

Mr. HALE. Certainly it can not. The Senator can object, and then it will go over.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had objected, but yielded on the assurance that it would take no debate.

Mr. DUBOIS. Before objection is made, I wish to say just a word.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I for one do not propose that this bill shall pass, taking charge of the things to which I have alluded, without there being opportunity, not only for me, but for other Senators, to examine it and to see whether it is a domain of legislation that we ought consistently to enter into.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. If this bill were such a measure as the Senator from Maine has stated, it would be open to great objection; but it is not.

Mr. DUBOIS. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. The statements made by the Senator from Maine in regard to the provisions of this bill do not represent the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. The bill simply provides that children under 14 years of age shall not be employed during school hours. That is the law in my State, and I believe it is the law in almost every other State. There is not anything more wholesome in legislation anywhere. The other provision is that as to those under 16, there shall simply be a certificate made——

Mr. HALE. I certainly, in the reading of the bill, heard the restriction applied to 16 years. I want an opportunity to examine this bill, and other Senators want that opportunity, and I am not content that the bill shall be taken up now.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I desire to make a simple statement to the Senator from Maine. I am quite sure he would not object to this bill if he understood its provisions. There are no restrictions of any kind in the District of Columbia in regard to child labor. They have child-labor laws in all the States. This bill, which is called my bill—it is not my bill—is a model bill taken from laws now in operation in Illinois, Ohio, and other States; laws which have passed the scrutiny of the courts and have been found to be practicable and effective. I repeat, it is a model bill in regard to child labor. It has been indorsed by all the organizations and the business houses of this city. Its passage is very necessary. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has made a report on the bill which, if any Senator will read, he will see the necessity for the passage of this measure. I feel quite deeply in regard to this matter, and I know the Senator from Maine would not object to it if he understood it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I sympathize with the object of this legislation, because I believe in the Government regulation of child labor and its prohibition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCOTT. I object, Mr. President, because I want to read the report on this subject, which I have only this moment had laid on my desk.

I wish to say that my experience with labor has been that the two brightest young men I have ever had in my business I educated at night school. They were 14 years of age. One of them is now in charge of a large factory, of which I am the president, and he is managing 800 people. The other is in a responsible position. I do not want to do anything that will debar a boy from securing an education or taking care of his mother or looking after his aged father, nor do I wish to deprive him of advantages which he may derive in the other direction. But I desire that we shall have time to examine the report on this bill, which, I repeat, has only been laid on our desks this morning, and I desire that we shall have an opportunity to read it; which we have not yet had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has been sitting in his seat for some time without rising to his feet to address the Chair; and I rose in my seat and addressed the Chair.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia. I do not want to antagonize him. I was not aware that the Senator from Virginia had addressed the Chair.

Mr. DANIEL. I had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to first address the Chair. Does he yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. But he did not rise from his seat to address the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN[arose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. Have I the floor, Mr. President, in my own right?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has the floor in his own right.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed what is known as the "employers' liability bill," in order to get a hearing upon an amendment which I offered thereto. I entered this motion several days ago, and I would ask now for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question will be: Will the Senate proceed to consider the motion to reconsider?

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senate will give unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was originally passed may be considered as reconsidered. I was ready to address the Senate on the amendment, but was called for a few moments out of the Chamber while a long speech was being delivered, it being known that I would next address the Senate on that subject in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Ohio. It was by accident that I was not then heard. I ask that unanimous consent be given that the vote by which the bill was passed shall be regarded as reconsidered. I shall not attempt to delay its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. I must object to any unanimous consent.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, Mr. President, I will proceed with my argument.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, a motion would be in order to proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DANIEL. Which I make, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill, the title of which will be stated, was passed.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

Mr. TILLMAN. If we can get a vote on it, I have no objection to the reconsideration.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no purpose to delay a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, the "ayes" have it.

Mr. DANIEL. Section 3 of the bill reads——

Mr. LODGE. What bill is that, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is known as the "employers' liability bill," which heretofore passed the Senate, and as to which a motion to reconsider was entered.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it was understood upon what the vote was being had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair put the question distinctly, but the Chair will put it again. In order that Senators may understand the parliamentary status, the Chair will state that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] some days ago entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 239 was passed. That motion he has now asked to have determined. He asked unanimous consent for its consideration, but there was objection. He then moved to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider, and that is the motion before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question, then, is on consideration?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to take up the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. DANIEL. The bill has been reconsidered; and I suppose it is now before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will please state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is whether or not the bill is before the Senate? Has the vote by which it was passed been reconsidered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is not before the Senate, but the motion to proceed to re-reconsider is the pending motion. Will the Senate proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that be put, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on that motion. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair, according to the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, there is a misunderstanding here. The Senate gave assent to the reconsideration by an affirmative vote. The question then was whether we should proceed to consider the bill. The bill was then before the Senate, but the Vice-President asked the question if it should then be proceeded with. There was no question raised as to the reconsideration at all. There was but one vote against it.

I will state that I have not been heard upon the amendment which I have offered. I was called casually out of the Chamber for a few moments while a long speech was being made. Having prepared that amendment and having requested my colleague to send to me if the speech ended, and having notified the patron of the bill of that fact, while I was casually and accidentally called out, by the sudden termination of the speech the matter was voted on without my being heard.

I do not regard it as proper consideration for any member of this body to dispose of legislation in that way. The amendment was lost which, I think, should have carried, and the Senate has not been advised of the reasons upon which I offered the amendment. Of course, it is the right and the pleasure of the Senate to do as it pleases.

Now, I ask, Mr. President, what is the present status?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is whether the Senate will proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill referred to was passed. The Chair put the question and, according to the sound, declared that the "noes" seemed to have it, and the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of the motion entered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I do not think the question was understood.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to say that he was not present at the time when the amendment which he offered, and to which he refers, was disposed of, and that he subsequently entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DANIEL. That is true. There was no yea-and-nay vote on it.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not care to cut off the Senator from making his statement. On the contrary, I am in favor of the Senator's amendment, but I desire to inquire of the Chair what would be the condition of the bill in case the motion now made by the Senator from Virginia should be voted down? So far as I am concerned, of course I should like to see the bill passed.

Mr. DANIEL. So should I.

Mr. MALLORY. But I do not want the matter delayed indefinitely.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to see the bill passed after I have been heard, and not before.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, has not the bill already been passed?

Mr. DANIEL. It has been.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed has been entered.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the motion to take up the motion to reconsider this morning has been voted down?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. TILLMAN. That has been voted down?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been voted down.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the railroad rate bill.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, just one word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. MONEY. I only desire to say a word, and it is simply this; I am sure the Senate did not hear the motion that was put by the Chair. I was sitting right here, and the noise of the conversation in the Chamber was so great that I did not hear it, for I intended to vote that the Senator from Virginia be given an opportunity to be heard on his motion. I hope the Senate will consent that the question be again put. It will not hurt anything.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair twice put the question distinctly to the Senate, but if there is a misunderstanding the Chair will, of course, again put it. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] moves that the Senate proceed to consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 239, known as the "employers' liability bill," was passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the Senate votes down the motion to proceed to reconsider, what will then be the condition of the bill? The bill will then be held there pending the motion to reconsider, will it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be the effect of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, if the Senate votes this motion down, it leaves this bill in the Senate hanging up?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It leaves it precisely where it is now.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia, [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" have it, and the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the third section of the pending bill, relating to the liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia——

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to know now the status of this bill. Has the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed been put to the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been. That is the pending question.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that the Senator from Virginia is debating?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has risen to debate that question. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which the House bill 239 was passed? The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, Mr. President, I proceed to state the reasons why I believe the vote by which this bill was passed ought to be reconsidered. Section 3 of this bill, relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and interstate commerce, reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That no contract of employment, insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity for injury or death entered into by or on behalf of any employee, nor the acceptance of any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity by the person entitled thereto, shall constitute any bar or defense to any action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to or death of such employee: Provided, however, That upon the trial of such action against any common carrier the defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his personal representative.

The amendment which I offered while the bill was pending before the Senate was to strike out that proviso. It is to the propriety of striking out that proviso that I will now speak.

Section 10 of the act "concerning carriers engaged in interstate commerce and their employees," which was approved June 1, 1898, reads as follows:

SEC. 10. That any employer subject to the provisions of this act and any officer, agent, or receiver of such employer who shall require any employee, or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, not to become or remain a member of any labor corporation, association, or organization; or shall threaten any employee with loss of employment, or shall unjustly discriminate against any employee because of his membership in such a labor corporation, association, or organization; or who shall require any employee or any person seeking employment, as a condition of such employment, to enter into a contract whereby such employee or applicant for employment shall agree to contribute to any fund for charitable, social, or beneficial purposes; to release such employer from legal liability for any personal injury by reason of any benefit received from such fund beyond the proportion of the benefit arising from the employer's contribution to such fund; or who shall, after having discharged an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, or who shall, after the quitting of an employee, attempt or conspire to prevent such employee from obtaining employment, is hereby declared to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district in which such offense was committed, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000.

Thus, Mr. President, eight years ago the Congress of the United States expressed its opinion as to the policy of the relief associations that are referred to in the proviso of this act and in the act from which I have just quoted. The latter act denounces the conduct of the corporations who compel their employees to joint the relief associations. The pending proviso rewards the corporations for violations of law, and gives them special privilege instead of punishment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there is so much conversation on the floor that it is utterly impossible for the Senator from Virginia to be heard. I ask that order be restored.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to say, Mr. President, it is not the fault of the Chair, but I respectfully suggest that sometimes those who are not members of the body are not considerate when they visit this Chamber in indulging in audible conversation.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, Mr. President, let us analyze the proviso which I have moved to strike out. Provision is made in this act for an action of damages that may be brought by an employee against a corporation engaged in interstate carrying, and this proviso authorizes, in defense of such action, that upon the trial thereof any such common carrier may set off in such action "any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his personal representative."

As it would seem to me, Mr. President, this is a most incongruous and most perverted effort to interject into such an action a plea of set-off that does not properly belong there.

Offset as a complete or partial defense is entirely unknown to the common law. It is entirely a creature of statute. Such a claim as is here described to be an offset and is authorized to be pleaded in an action of damages does not answer to the term. What is an offset, Mr. President? I read from Waterman on Set-Off, Recoupment, and Counterclaim:

> Set-off signifies the subtraction or taking away of one demand from another opposite or cross demand, so as to extinguish the smaller demand and reduce the greater by the amount of the less; or, if the opposite demands are equal, to extinguish both.

This is a condensed definition of offset or set-off, but neither the indemnity, the relief, the benefit, nor the insurance which is here authorized to be pleaded as an offset answers to that definition. Neither, Mr. President, would any equitable extension of the law of offset, nor any definition of recoupment or counterclaim, which are connate branches of the law of offset, apply to such a case as this.

The relief, the benefit, the insurance, or the indemnity which an employee of a railroad company receives from a society to which he belongs and which accrues to him in case he is injured while in the service of the corporation has already been paid for by his contribution thereto. "Paid"—significant word. Paid—that is a word that shows it was owed. If paid, it has been extinguished. How can a paid and extinguished debt be made offset to a new claim against him by the creditor? The fact that the railroad corporation may have been itself a member of that society and may have contributed to a fund provided for the relief, indemnity, and insurance of its employees is a totally irrelevant matter in an action of an employee for damages occasioned by the negligence of that concern.

In the fourth volume of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of this body there will be found a collation of considerable matter upon this subject. In that matter will be found the protest of the employees of corporations in this country, very ably and powerfully presented by H. R. Fuller, esq., who is their representative here. It shows that these relief associations are formed by compulsion of corporations, and they here seek to engraft themselves upon this bill, which has as its animus the giving of a fair and just relief to the employees.

The gentleman to whom I refer gave his testimony before the Industrial Commission on May 11, 1900, and that testimony will be found in the fourth volume of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, page 3177. I ask the attention of Senators to what this representative of these workingmen has here said, and I ask to insert in my remarks a transcript from his testimony, pages 3177 and 3178:

In the first place, Mr. President, he shows that the relief departments of the corporations are practically carried on by deductions from the wages of the employees each month. He shows further that, while they are in name voluntary, they are generally compulsory, and are forced into being by the paramount influence of the corporations themselves and against the protest and will of their employees. He further shows that while the employees furnish the majority, and in many cases the overwhelming majority, of the fund that is paid out in relief, they are not permitted themselves to control the association, which is different from the organization of the corporations. He says this as to their effect:

> The effect of these associations on the relations between employer and employee is anything but pleasant. The employees have had their eyes opened in regard to these associations. They see that through the intricate workings of these relief departments they are being financially robbed and deprived of their legal rights in the courts, and they denounce them bitterly.

He further asserts—and as an experienced railroad man and the public spokesman and the chosen witness to give testimony he is certainly one who is entitled to be heard and entitled to be respected until his statements have been satisfactorily answered, if they can be—that—

> The primary motives of railroad companies in operating these departments are avaricious rather than benevolent: First, because they require an employee to release them from responsibility for injury, and, second, because membership in the relief department keeps employees out of labor organizations on account of their being unable to pay the dues in both. In this way the employees are deprived of the great benefit of labor organizations, and the company's hands are therefore more free to impose unfavorable conditions upon its men, and through this means they will become gradually bound up so that the company can do as it pleases with them. If these relief departments did not serve the purposes of releasing the company from responsibility for injury and alienating the interests of employees from labor organizations, there would not be many of them in existence.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. The relief departments are relief departments, as I understand, of the railroad, so called. So the word "it," where it appears here—

> The defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed—

Would apply to a contribution on the part of the railroad and not a contribution on the part of the men themselves.

Mr. DANIEL. That is correct, sir.

Now, Mr. President, if these allegations of this representative of labor organizations in this country are true, the Senate in refusing to adopt the amendment which I have offered will play into the hands of and reenforce the powers of their oppressors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DANIEL. I do, sir, for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand, the Senator is reading from testimony given some six years ago.

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir; I am reading from testimony that was given not only six years ago, but which was repeated last year by the witness.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for information merely. Did Mr. Fuller appear when the bill that is now under consideration was pending in either branch of Congress, and oppose that provision in the law? Mr. Fuller——

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator will look in vain through the testimony before the committee to find it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Fuller is a very diligent man, both before committees and in his attendance upon the sessions of the Senate in a proper way, and it seems to me that if he had had objections, he would not have omitted to appear either in the House or the Senate to have urged those objections at the present time. Matters have changed greatly in six years, both as regards the management of railroads and as regards the opinion of some of the men who are working for railroads.

Mr. DANIEL. I am well aware, Mr. President, that rapid changes often occur in the spirit of political and public dreams. I have seen men in public life stand up and advocate one opinion and vote another. I am not quoting, however, from any ancient testimony. I am reading from comparatively fresh testimony. It is in the fourth volume of the hearings before a committee of this body, on page 3176. This testimony——

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator kindly give the date?

Mr. DANIEL. I am trying to find the date, but the day's session was so long sometimes, when extensive testimony was taken, that I have not been able to find the date.

Mr. KEAN. I listened to the testimony——

Mr. DANIEL. Let the Senator turn to the fourth volume, and he can tell us the date.

Mr. KEAN. In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee last year?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, 1905, or it may have been this year, for all I know. I have not the date here. It was where Mr. Fuller appeared, and where he spread before the committee, as his then view, testimony which he had given years previously before the Industrial Commission. Be that as it may, there is evidence in the report of this committee as to the truth of his allegations. Let the Senator turn to page 3178 and to the heading "Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company—Relief Department." He will read in the first clause of the form of application of a person seeking employment by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, these words:

Do hereby, as one of the conditions of such employment, apply for membership in the relief feature, and consent and agree to be bound by all the regulations of the relief department now in force.

Senators will then see in a succeeding clause where the deduction of the employee's wages is required. They will then see this release that is given by the employee:

The acceptance of benefits from such relief feature for the injury or death shall operate as a release of all claims against said company or any company owning or operating its branches or divisions or any company over whose railroad, right of way, or property the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company or any company owning or operating its branches or divisions shall have the right to run or operate its engines or cars or send its employees in the performance of their duty, for damages by reason of such injury or death could be made by or through me.

And so on. I know not the exact date when this form of application was required by this great corporation, but surely with so many friendly eyes reading this exhibit made by Mr. Fuller and with it spread of record in a public document of this kind, it is not likely that that habit has changed without our being fully advised thereof. Continuously through this document, in many forms of evidence will be found similar forms of application in other companies and the views of employees as to the methods which are taken to constrain their membership in these relief associations and to compel them to release their claims against the railroad company which the act now before the Senate is intended to give them aid and facility in urging.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DANIEL. For a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to section 3 of the bill under consideration, where it is specifically provided "that no contract of employment, insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity," etc., shall act as a bar——

Mr. DANIEL. I read that to begin with.

Mr. GALLINGER. "Or defense to any action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to or death of such employee." So those old contracts, if they were made, certainly would be reversed by this statutory provision.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; they would be reversed by a statute eight years old, which I also read to this body; and the curious part of the matter is that while Congress looks in that direction, both in the statute of 1898, which I read, and in the third section of the proposed statute, which the Senator has just quoted, it turns upon its track and looks back and seeks to make an offset and defense to the claim out of the very pernicious practices which the law has denounced. But this proviso is repugnant not only to the theory of this bill, but to the policy which this Government sets forth in the act of Congress of 1898.

I now call attention to page 3204, fourth volume of hearings before the committee, where is set forth by Mr. Fuller a summary of questions and answers given to the employees of these companies on this subject:

The total number of lodges making replies to the questions was 28. They came from 26 cities and towns in 7 different States and represent 1,674 members.

In answer to question 1, 100 per cent say that membership in the relief department is considered by the employees to be compulsory.

In answer to question 2, 100 per cent say that men who seek employment do not receive it if they do not make application for membership in the relief department.

In answer to question 3, 100 per cent say the blank application for membership in the relief department is handed to the new employee without solicitation on his part.

In answer to question 4, 100 per cent say that the actions of the company's representatives are such as to make him believe that the filling out of this blank by him is necessary to secure employment.

Strange to say this question has been before the Senate for two or three years, and while this bill has been the shuttlecock between this committee and that committee, no committee has ever expounded the terms and the significance of the bill presented to this body on this subject. In a hasty moment, in the closing days of Congress, in the twinkling of an eye, an amendment which seeks to bring before this body an intelligent view of this subject and to inform it, is defeated; we now find in the body of this bill a proviso intended to reenforce and to support the pernicious policies of corporations and to impede the natural and just methods of their employees to get damages for wrongs. It was adopted with little debate.

Two Senators answered in brief terms the brief statement of mine in favor of this amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire answered us by telling of some good deeds the railroads had done in his part of the State, and by making some allusion to a supposed ban the corporations are under in this body. The Senator from Ohio made an appeal for justice to railroad corporations without the slightest suggestion of any fact upon which anyone could conclude that an injustice was contemplated. The Senator from Wisconsin, equally vague in his suggestion, set forth mildly that the bill might be unconstitutional if this proviso were left out. Why, he did not suggest, and he leaves my imagination still wondering why, why. The right of offset, even when it exists, is based on a claim which is the subject-matter of an independent suit. Nothing can properly be made by law the subject-matter of offset unless it were something for which the holder thereof might himself institute a separate and independent suit.

There, Mr. President, is the crux of this matter. Let any Senator ask himself, if he designs to deliver intelligent judgment upon this subject, whether or not a railroad company which has some stock in a relief association, which either compels, induces, or persuades its employees to join, has an independent claim to recover back its contributions from any one of them who may claim relief from the association. Certainly not. The railroad company voluntarily contributes to a beneficial institution. It gets its own benefit by supplying ready relief, not to the particular man who may be the victim of its negligence, but to any one of its employees, whether a member of the association or not, whether he suffers by its negligence or not, and it is for its own good government and not as an independent philanthropic or eleemosynary concern that it provides its surgeons and its reliefs and its succors for its employees.

So far as the employee himself is concerned, he has paid for any relief which he may get out of the fund by his own contributions from month to month, from year to year, it may be throughout a generation, it may be having paid in much more than he will get out at the last. And then, when the company, by remissness to do what it should have done, or by positive and injurious wrongdoing, has caused damage to an employee, and he goes into court to get relief from law, the one who has posed as a philanthropist and who seeks to be commended here in that character, comes and seeks by law to convert a voluntary contribution given in its own interest into a claim and a demand upon the whole body of its employees.

The representative magazines and journals of employees in this country have fully shown the utter fallacy and false pretense of these assertions. The Interstate Commerce Commission in its thirteenth annual report adverts to the subject-matter, and calls the attention of Congress to it. No committee of this body and not a single Senator upon this floor has suggested a single substantial idea in favor of that provision, and up to this moment not a single thought has come forth from any mind justifying, vindicating, or even making plausible defense for this strange insertion into this bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] generally looks upon all subjects with a very composed mind and never seeks by extravagant expressions or by appeals to improper considerations to move the minds of his hearers. I will go further than he has done in applauding some of the good deeds of railroad corporations. I have before me now a paper which was handed me yesterday by the secretary of a railroad Young Men's Christian Association. I do not regard these relief associations as benevolent institutions, although much benevolence may grow out of them. It is not benevolence on the part of the company that inspires it. It is not benevolence that produces its contributions. It is a strict matter of business, and one pressed in this amendment to a most severe and usurious conclusion. But there is some good and very great good that many of these corporations are engaged in doing.

In this country there are 220 railroad Young Men's Christian Associations. They have a total membership of 80,000 railroad men. A hundred and thirty-six buildings are occupied by these organizations. The value of their buildings is $2,517,000. Seventy-five per cent of the cost of these buildings has been contributed by the railroad corporations, and about 25 per cent by the railroad men. These buildings are either owned in fee simple or held by long lease at a nominal rental by the railroad association of employees. They are operating on over 78 per cent of the railroad mileage of the United States. They are having a most happy influence over the employees, and as one of these secretaries has said in a paper he has written upon this subject, "They are good for the men; better for the company, best for the public."

I accord great credit to the enlightened corporations of this country who have put to work along their lines an influence so wholesome and so beneficial to good business interests and to the society of the land and so helpful to those industrial men who take their lives in their hands every day while they are conducting the powerful and dangerous enginries of steam and travel in this country. I am not one of those Senators, if there be any, who seek in this Chamber to excite prejudice against any class of my fellow-citizens or against any class of public corporations. There is good, there is bad, and there is the indifferent in almost all if not all human concerns. When I come to a page of facts such as those I have recited I bow my head before a noble and just thing and say unto myself, "Whether it be done by railroad corporations or by anyone else, so shines a good deed in a naughty world." But, Mr. President, these relief associations are horses of a different color.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator.

In the few observations I made the other day I had in mind the class of benefactions that the Senator has just alluded to. As an illustration, in my own little city the railroad has rented for a good many years a large building that was used for a railroad branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, and has just now purchased the land and is about to erect a beautiful building upon it. I have thought it was a most excellent work; and that is true of every large city and town in New Hampshire. I am glad the Senator has called attention to it. That is what I had particularly in view.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am always glad to hear of such good things. I am glad to have an opportunity to applaud them. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire in all that he has said in praise of the worthy men who are conducting and advancing such commendable work.

But I hope the Senator will also agree with me when I demur to that evidence as bearing upon an amendment in the Senate which simply tends to secure the freedom and independence of railroad employees, which will prevent a corporation from exercising any oppressive influence over them, and which will also prevent the attempted legal construction of a voluntary benevolent contribution into a legal demand and into an offset against a claim for damages.

The things are of different character. There is nothing in the character of a voluntary contribution of a railroad corporation to an association under its own patronage for the benefit of all of its men that suggests the idea of a claim of an offset when one of those men sues for damages for wrong.

Mr. President, every man, woman, and child in the United States is deeply interested in the correct organization of common carriers. My worthy friend [Mr. GALLINGER], whom I always hear with pleasure, had a little experience with a common carrier a month or two ago which caused his friends to shudder. He knows that unless those great institutions, so necessary to the public business and to the public comfort, are conducted upon precise and just business methods no results but those to be deplored can flow.

I would be ashamed to be unjust to a railroad company. I think there is nothing more degrading to any man, and nothing that so bespeaks either mental or moral weakness, than would be disclosed in a willingness to be unjust to a corporation any more than to an employee. Justice is the one thing that every man on this earth has a right to demand, from power as well as from weakness, from those in authority as well as those who are without it. If it were just to a railroad company to allow it to construct its voluntary contributions into an offset to impede the claim of one of its employees for damages which resulted to him from its own wrong; to take away from his widow and his orphans, if he be gone, the compensation which it should pay for the damages which it inflicted, and credit it over to the railroad company to reimburse it for a voluntary gift which it claimed to have made—if that be just, then the Senator from New Hampshire is a just man in asking that it be done here. I do not think it is just. I can not support that proviso in this bill.

Some question was asked me about the attitude of Mr. Fuller. Mr. Fuller, it may be, thinks that this bill will not go through this body unless this proviso is assented to. It may be that he also thinks it will not go through another body, which it must pass ere it becomes a law, unless this proviso be assented to. It may be that, therefore, he would succumb and relent in his efforts to get justice and follow the vague trail of policy to get some justice and let some injustice go.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] assented a few days ago that this bill might pass with that proviso in it. I can not think that that is his unconstrained and independent thought. I can not believe that if his hand had been penning this bill he would have written any such proviso in it. Perhaps he has penned a bill and probably such a proviso will not be found in it. I had the honor to offer this bill as an amendment to another bill, and I struck that proviso out. I believe that once I offered a bill with that proviso in it. At that time I was acting unwittingly and was assuming facts which might naturally be assumed from the words of the proviso. But before the time came to act upon these measures I took occasion to look into their history, and when I discovered the protest that had been made against that proviso and the worthy and strong considerations of private right and of public policy upon which that protest was based that was the end of the proviso with me.

Mr. President, if I could get a hearing before a full Senate, and if my colleagues in this body could fully understand this amendment, its nature and its purposes, they would never, in my opinion, permit this bill to pass with their indorsement thereof. It has been argued with me that I had better withdraw my objection and let the bill go as it is, and that probably the conferees would fix it all right and it would come back to us with this obnoxious nob shaved and planed off and with this bad wrinkle smoothed out. I hope if the proviso stays in the bill the conferees will strike it out.

But there is nothing, Mr. President, in the history of conferences to make me beguile myself with any such optimistic faith. The conference which has just reported denies to the Christian associations, who have got their angels of mercy following every line of traffic in this country, the right to go upon the railways that they are serving to minister to the sick and dying. When conferences act against one of the most wholesome and blessed organizations of the land, which carries healing on its wings, can we properly rely on a conference extracting the poison from this bill which we are urged to put in it? The Senate must see for itself that it is right; and if we are right in the character of legislation that we send forth from this body, we can stand against the world. We can rest under our own vines and fig trees, with none to make us afraid. But how poor are they who lean on princes' favors, whether those princes sit on conference committees or rule the world from other thrones of power. The little that we can do in this world is to do the best to keep ourselves right, and if we succeed fairly well in that we have accomplished a great and worthy undertaking.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senate to reconsider this bill, to strike out that obnoxious proviso, which is against the policy of the law of eight years' standing, which is against natural right, which is utterly un-American, and which is an artificial and shrewdly concocted attempt to give powerful people advantage over those who have suffered wrong by their default.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator in charge of the unfinished business will consent that it may be temporarily laid aside until we can get a vote on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will consent to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. DANIEL to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I know the anxiety of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to take up the conference report on the rate bill, and I will not protract this discussion at all. I simply will ask to have read the letter which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 2, 1906.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: With regard to the amendment proposed by Senator DANIEL, to strike out the proviso contained in section 3 of the employers' liability bill (H. R. 239), I am authorized on behalf of the 230,000 railroad employees who are seeking this legislation, and in whose interest it is supposed to be, to express the hope that this amendment will not be adopted for the following reasons:

1. As now legally advised, it would seriously threaten the validity of the whole section.

2. From a moral standpoint, we think it only just and fair that the carrier should be given credit for such amounts as it has actually paid to an injured employee on account of such injury.

Very truly, yours,

H. R. FULLER,
Legislative Representative.

Mr. KEAN. In order to dispose of this bill and that we may enact it into a law as soon as possible, I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Virginia on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Virginia to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill stands passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] will kindly yield to me, I should like to get the conference report on the rate bill before the Senate, and let us dispose of it one way or the other, either approve it or disapprove it, and let it get back to conference. The Senator from South Dakota asked me not to move to take up the conference report, I suppose because of the doubt of the parliamentary condition that that might raise. I do not want to displace the unfinished business. The Senator kindly consents that the unfinished business be laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of enabling the Senator from South Carolina to bring before the Senate the conference report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a fact, which no lawyer will controvert, that there is a provision in this bill which is palpably unconstitutional outside of any question that has been debated here, and that therefore the bill ought to come back into the Senate that it might examine it on that question.

I do not intend to discuss any question that has been discussed heretofore in reference to this bill, though I agree with some of my brethren that there are other questions in it that are violative of the Constitution. I intend to confine myself to a single point, and that for the purpose of having the Senate reject this conference report, so that the bill may come back into the Senate, if the Senate pleases to have the act done.

On page 24, when the Commission has awarded damage to any applicant he can sue in the United States court, and when he sues that court is given jurisdiction to give him a judgment and execution. But what about the cost?

Such suit shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the circuit court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the petitioner shall finally prevail he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the costs of the suit.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. PETTUS. From page 24 of the last print.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that part of the bill has already been accepted by both Houses and is out of the reach of the Senate now.

Mr. PETTUS. That is the more reason why the report should be rejected, so that the Senate——

Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble about it is that the Senate itself can not get it any more, having accepted it, without a reconsideration of the whole thing and bringing it back into the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. At all events, Mr. President, I hope I will be allowed to say what I have to say. I am not going to detain the Senate more than a few minutes. I rarely ever speak long.

It has been decided several times that a provision requiring one of the parties to pay costs or to pay attorneys' fees and exempting the other is not due process of law, and so far as I have been informed it has never been decided to the contrary in any case. I will read from an Alabama case, where the provision was exactly like this, that if a man sued the railroad for damages and recovered, he should have his attorney's fees, besides the other costs. I will read the opinion so far as it applies to this question, and this opinion is well sustained by authorities, by the Supreme Court and by text writers, by Cooley on Constitutional Limitations. It is the case of South and North Alabama Railroad Company v. Morris, found in 65 Alabama Reports, on page 198:

It is further insisted that the court below erred in allowing an attorney's tax fee to the appellant's counsel, on the ground that the law authorizing it is unconstitutional and void.

Just like this, it allowed an attorney's fee to the man suing the railroad, but allowed no attorney's fee to the railroad if it succeeded.

This action of the court was taken under the provisions of section 1715 of the Code, which constituted section 6 of the statute in question, and reads as follows:

"SEC. 1715. Any corporation, person, or persons owning or controlling any railroad in this State, or any complainant against such corporation, person, or persons, taking an appeal from a decision rendered by a justice of the peace in suit for damages brought under the provisions of section 1711 and failing to sustain such appeal, or to reduce or increase the judgment before the appellate court, shall be liable for a reasonable attorney's fee incurred by reason of such appeal, to be assessed by the court, not to exceed $20; and the attorney's fee shall be part of the cost and collected as such."

After a careful consideration of this question, during which it has been held under protracted advisement by the whole bench, a conclusion has been reached which clearly persuades us that this particular section of the code is violative of both the constitution of the State and that of the United States. The following sections of the declaration of rights (constitution of 1875, art. 1) are pertinent to this subject:

Speaking of the Alabama constitution—

"provides that all persons resident in this State who are citizens are entitled to possess 'equal civil and political rights.'"

It goes on down and cites the Constitution of the United States to the effect that a person can not be deprived of his property without due process of law:

The clear legal effect of these provisions is to place all persons, natural and corporate, as near as practicable upon a basis of equality in the enforcement and defense of their rights in courts of justice in this State, except so far as may be otherwise provided in the constitution. This right, though subject to legislative regulation, can not be impaired or destroyed under the guise or device of being regulated. Justice can not be sold or denied by the exaction of a pecuniary consideration for its enjoyment from one when it is given freely and openhanded to another, without money and without price. Nor can it be permitted that litigants shall be debarred from the free exercise of this constitutional right by the imposition of arbitrary, unjust, and odious discriminations perpetrated under color of establishing peculiar rules for a particular occupation. Unequal, partial, and discriminatory legislation which secures this right to some favored class or classes and denies it to others, who are thus excluded from that equal protection designed to be secured by the general law of the land, is in clear and manifest opposition to the letter and spirit of the foregoing constitutional provisions.

It was forcibly said by the supreme court of Tennessee, in Wally v. Kennedy (2 Yerger, 554): "The right of every individual must stand or fall by the same rule or law that governs every other member of the body politic, or land, under similar circumstances, and every partial or private law which directly proposes to destroy or affect individual rights, or does the same thing by affording remedies leading to similar consequences, is unconstitutional and void. Were it otherwise, odious individuals and corporations would be governed by one law and the mass of the community and those who made the law by another, whereas the like general law, affecting the whole community equally, could not have been passed."

The opinion quotes a case in Massachusetts:

It is manifestly contrary to the first principles of civil liberty and natural justice and to the spirit of our Constitution and laws that any one citizen should enjoy privileges and advantages which are denied to all others under like circumstances, or that one should be subject to losses, damages, suits, or actions from which all others under like circumstances are exempted.

Mr. President, in this very law there are fierce denunciations and terrible punishments inflicted upon people who make unjust discriminations; and yet this proposed law has in it that same vice. It makes these unjust discriminations against one suitor; it exempts one of them from all costs and requires the others to pay the costs, including an attorney's fee, to be allowed by the court as a part of the costs in the case.

Mr. President, I only desire, if any other Senators discuss these other constitutional questions, that they will tell us wherein this decision is defective. It is supported, as I stated before, by numerous decisions of the supreme court of Alabama and of the Supreme Court of the United States and by the text writers. I have not found one—and I have examined carefully—in conflict with it.

My purpose, as I said before, in making these remarks is to induce Senators, if they see fit, to set aside this conference report and let it go back or to act upon it in any other way. I want to destroy the conference report, so that the Senate may act as it sees fit in regard to this unconstitutional provision. I should like to have Senators at least examine this before they pass upon the matter.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, of course rejecting the conference report would not bring this bill back to the consideration of the Senate and open the door to an amendment such as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] suggests.

Mr. PETTUS. I do not say that it would.

Mr. SPOONER. I had the floor last night on this subject at the adjournment, and I take it this morning for the purpose of submitting a few observations upon two propositions which the report presents.

I do not intend to lecture the conference committee or to reprobate it at all for having exceeded the functions of a conference committee by inserting in the bill propositions which are absolutely new and not cognate to anything that was in it as it passed the Senate, although I think one or two provisions which are challenged as being beyond the functions of the conference committee were within its functions and are properly in the conference report as made. Two things are to be said in defense of the committee, if it needs any defense. One is that it has often been done; the other is that the committee was absolutely frank about it and called the attention of the Senate to the provisions which may be regarded as obnoxious to the rule; but the rule is a good rule, and in the long run the only safety is in observing it.

Mr. President, I object very strenuously to the amendment reported by the conference committee prohibiting absolutely free transportation. They report this proposition:

> No carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passage. Any carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000; and any person who uses, solicits, or accepts for himself or for another any such interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be subject to a like penalty.

I think railway carriers should not be permitted to grant transportation to an officer of the Government or to those whose function it is to legislate upon this subject. Members of Congress, I think, should not use passes and should not be permitted to solicit them. The issuing of railroad passes to them should be prohibited. The same thing is true as to the judiciary; the same thing is true as to that department which executes the law.

I think, too, Mr. President, that the general prohibition of free transportation is wise, because free transportation if it is left entirely open to the will of the transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, may be used very efficiently as a means of discriminating between shippers. Some will have passes, embracing themselves and others, and some will not, that being made dependent upon the relation of the shippers to the companies. I think that ought to be stopped; and I think the rule is a wise rule that they should not be issued at all; but that does not involve that there should not be, in the public interest, and should not be, as a matter of common justice and common decency, some exceptions to that rule.

The report made by the committee of conference repeals, of course, the existing law, which has been in force ever since 1895, against which I have heard no complaint that it has been subject to abuse. That law provides:

> That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments—

I do not care so much for that, although there are certain catastrophes which have occurred and which in the future may occur, like the San Francisco case and others, where perhaps it would not be only just, but generous and wise, that there should be some "leeway"— > or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the boards of managers of said homes; nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees.

Mr. President, no reason in the world that I can imagine can be given for the strict and absolute rule upon this subject reported by the conference committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know that I would be disclosing any secrets of the conference to say that we either had to take this or nothing.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has disclosed one of the secrets of the conference committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. The proposition was that we should take this or strike out others, but I am unwilling to leave the old law stand, because it has no punitive clause in it. It is a kind of a loose thing that has a pretense of prohibiting free passes and has not accomplished anything. By putting this drastic provision in, or by consenting to it, the Senate conferees merely deferred action until such time as we could consider this matter calmly and sanely and provide an effective antipass law. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, we can not, of course, propose an amendment to this report. Whatever is done upon this subject must be done by the conference committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state, further, while I am on my feet, that we were very anxious to arrive at an agreement on all subjects in dispute, and that caused the Senate conferees to give way on some important points that we would not have yielded if it had not been with that view.

Now, having had this matter referred back to us, as I presume it will be presently, I want to say that unless we can get something that is acceptable to the Senate and acceptable to the country I am going to report a disagreement, if my colleagues will help me do it, and let the Senate take the matter up and instruct us as to what they want done.

Mr. SPOONER. That is just what the conference committee ought to do. I am not criticising the conference committee, but I should have liked their report better if they had reported a disagreement upon this proposition. The Senate overburdened the proposition. It contains elements fairly subject to criticism—there is no doubt about that; and I think it will be very easy, Mr. President, for the conference committee to eliminate disputable items—fairly disputable items—from the Senate amendment; but there are some which can not be disputed; there are some which ought not to be eliminated, and there are some which I hope the conference committee will not agree shall be eliminated. We have among the Senate amendments this proposition:

> No carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall hereafter directly or indirectly issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers except to its officers, agents, employees, surgeons, physicians, actual and bona fide attorneys, and members of their immediate families.

Now, upon what conceivable theory ought the Congress in this respect to step between the employer and the employee? What sense is there, Mr. President, in the matter of rate regulation to prohibit railway carriers from granting free transportation to the men upon whose labor and upon whose skill they are constantly dependent for the safe operation of their railways? Almost from time immemorial, until it has become traditional, it has been the habit of railway carriers to give free transportation to their employees. It has become a matter of course; and in some of the telegrams which I presented to the Senate—and the same is true as to telegrams presented by other Senators—the employees treat it as a part of their compensation. The telegraphers, in their protest against this bill, say it is specifically made a part of their compensation, and, if it is taken away, they have very grave doubt whether there will be substituted for it an equivalent increase in compensation. Mr. President, I think the railway employees of the country have a right to resent it. There are 1,200,000 of them in the United States. There is no better, no more reliable, no more careful, no more devoted band of workers in this or any other country. The lives of the passengers on the trains are dependent upon their skill, upon their discretion, and upon their fidelity. It is a rare thing for one of them to fail in courage or duty. To say that a railroad employee under no circumstances may ask for or receive from his employer free transportation over the road over which he runs the engine or conducts the train seems to me an absurdity. And, as to their families——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I will not interrupt the Senator unless it is agreeable.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator had better interrupt me now if he wishes to at all.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that the owners and agents in charge of live stock should be considered in the same category?

Mr. SPOONER. No; not in the same category at all. But I will get to that.

Mr. WARREN. So far as their transportation is concerned, they are in the same category in one sense.

Mr. SPOONER. They are not in the same category in any sense. The justification for free transportation or half-fare transportation for the owner or his employee accompanying live stock is ample; but the argument in support of it is, I think, from an entirely different standpoint. But I will get to that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Following the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], I think where the regulation of the railroad itself requires that a man shall accompany every shipment of live stock, the man who accompanies a shipment of live stock is, at least pro hac vice, in the service of the railroad; and if he goes in obedience to a requirement of the railroad, I think then he comes properly within the exception. So far as I am concerned, the only two exceptions I am willing to make is the one the Senator is now discussing, which I think ought to be made, and also an exception in the case of the live-stock shipper when the regulations of the railroad require a man to accompany such shipments.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, Mr. President, that the man accompanying a shipment of live stock ought to come within the exception. I have not any doubt about it; but I do not base my support of that proposition upon the theory that he is in any sense an employee or sustains any relation to the railway company.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is this similarity: I do not claim he is exactly on the same basis, but he really is in a practical sense an employee of the road, so far as transportation is concerned. His fare for accompanying live stock is figured with the rate or freight tariff on the stock with which he is traveling. The railroads require that a man shall travel with the stock; and if the owner or his employee did not go the railroad would have to employ a man to send with it. So that while such shippers may not be employees, surely their privileges should be enlarged and they should travel without cost, since they have no compensation for their service at the time. In my opinion, they should be reckoned with the employees, so far as the privileges of free transportation are concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, Mr. President, the proposition to except the owner or his employee accompanying a shipment of live stock is, as I have said, entirely justifiable. I think the Senator weakens it, as one always does weaken a proposition, by contending for it upon an assumption which has no logical foundation. If the Senator were shipping a carload of blooded horses, and he preferred to accompany them himself, the shipment being conditioned by the railroad company upon the live stock being accompanied by the owner or some one representing him, he would not be in any sense an employee of the railroad company; he would sustain no relation whatever to the railroad company.

Mr. FULTON. He might be an appurtenant.

Mr. SPOONER. No; he would not even be an appurtenant. If he were an appurtenant he would be subject to the railroad mortgages. So he would not be that. He would not be an employee of the railroad company; he could not be hired and could not be discharged by the railroad company; he can not be controlled by the railroad company, and he would have no relation to the railroad company.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. It is perfectly plain that the Senator from Wisconsin and I practically agree. It would be a misfortune for me if we did not. I want to ask him another question, if he will permit me, while he is discussing this proposed restriction. As I understand, the bill came from the House with no provision whatever regarding passes. Am I right about that?

Mr. TILLMAN. There was nothing of that nature in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. It was left as it is under existing law.

Mr. WARREN. The Senate passed the bill permitting certain people to ask for and receive passes. It seems to me that the duty and the privilege of the conferees would lie between the maximum and the minimum—that is to say, between having no restriction whatever and some of the restrictions which the Senate introduced in the measure while it was under consideration here.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate can recede.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate can recede and agree to the House bill as it came here.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly; but what I am getting at is by what authority or justice do the conferees strike out into new territory entirely beyond what was considered either by the House or the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. There is no mathematical limitation upon the conferees. The whole subject was entirely open.

Mr. WARREN. It is simply introducing new matter—new legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is not introducing new matter.

Mr. WARREN. Well, new restrictions.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senate passed a provision in regard to free transportation. It was not a narrow provision, either. It was, if anything, too large, too broad. The House disagreed and left that subject entirely open to the conferees, and in what the conferees have done about it, so far as the functions of conferees are concerned, beyond any question they acted entirely within their right.

Mr. President, another thing. I was saying when interrupted that there is no reason why the families of railway employees should not be included in the free transportation granted by the carrier which employs them or obtained by an exchange from other carriers. These men all have their vacation time. It is for their pleasure, for their good, and for the good of the public that they should avail themselves of it by travel and rest and recreation. It is for their good and for the good of the public that their families should accompany them, if they wish to do so. Comparatively few, I think, of the families, and perhaps few of the operatives themselves, would travel very much if they were obliged, as the rest of us are—and, I think, ought to be—to pay full fare. I think the railroad men of this country are right in the intensity and earnestness of the protests with which they have flooded the Senate Chamber against this proposition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. The provision in regard to passes, as reported by the conferees and as it appeared in the bill as it passed the Senate, is to the effect that railroads shall not, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free transportation?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. That means, I assume, that transportation shall not be given wholly without a consideration?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Would it be an evasion of this law, or in any sense a violation of it, if the railroads should agree, as they can do, and impliedly do under the present practice, to furnish transportation to their employees as a part of the consideration for the services they render? Especially would that apply in cases where men are sent with live stock. That is part of the consideration of the shipment. There is another class of people who ought to have attention, and who have been telegraphing Senators, and they are the railway mail clerks. I ask why the Government could not make an arrangement and have it a part of the contract with the railroad for carrying the mail that the railroad should furnish free transportation to such clerks under certain conditions? Why could not all these objections be met by some contractual relation?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not believe in enacting legislation which will be just only in the event that it is evaded. There are very broad prohibitions in this bill, and rightly so, against discriminations, and this amendment, as reported by the conference committee, was obviously intended to prevent any such evasion as the Senator from Missouri suggests.

Mr. STONE. I do not mean it as an evasion. I asked the Senator the question whether it would be an evasion.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it would.

Mr. STONE. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER (reading):

No carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly.

Directly or indirectly—

issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passage.

Mr. President, if that language were construed, in the light of the record history of the section, it would be construed in the light of the fact that the Senate had provided for the issue of such transportation in excepted cases, including employees and their families, and that the conference committee had stricken it out and made the prohibition an absolute one, and by the use of the words "directly or indirectly" had rendered it impossible to evade it without liability to the penalty paragraph of the section.

Why should not railroad corporations, common carriers in interstate commerce, be permitted to exchange free transportation with the officers of other companies and their families and the employees of other such carriers and their families? It has always been done. It is in the interest of the public that it should be done; and why should it be prohibited? Who has complained of the operation of the existing law in that respect?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator asks that question. I should like to ask him right now if he is complaining of the existing law, and if he believes there is any occasion whatever for adopting this provision? Is not all that we ought to prohibit in the matter of free transportation already prohibited by the interstate-commerce law, and has not the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which reinstated the punitive provisions of that old law, made it so that it is complete in itself, and that there is an absolute prohibition except in the very cases for which the Senator contends?

Mr. SPOONER. My recollection is that the punitive provision to which the Senator refers as having been introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts does not apply to this provision at all. It applies to matters——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see. This is the provision, if I may read it:

That anything done or omitted to be done by a corporation common carrier, subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, which, if done or omitted to be done by any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, would constitute a misdemeanor under said acts or under this act, shall also be held to be a misdemeanor committed by such corporation, and upon conviction thereof it shall be subject to like penalties as are prescribed in said acts or by this act with reference to such persons, except as such penalties are herein changed.

Mr. SPOONER. That would cover it, I think, on reflection.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that it is sufficiently broad, and that there is no necessity for this provision.

Mr. SPOONER. That would have been a good argument to have addressed to the Senate against incorporating in this bill the provision which the conference committee has eliminated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not also a good argument for the Senate to recede entirely from that amendment? I appreciate the fact that the Senate wanted to go on record in some positive way that it was opposed to free transportation; but when it is shown clearly that by the amendment already in the law it is opposed to it, I do not see the necessity of its going on record a second time to practically reenact what is already the law.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a question of receding from the amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will concede that it is better to recede from that amendment than to adopt it as the conferees have reported it.

Mr. SPOONER. We are not obliged to face that alternative.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from North Dakota secured the insertion of an amendment which he thought and declared is of vital consequence to the agricultural region which he represents, and that is the provision which permits railroad corporations to transport, as I recollect, agricultural laborers under such regulations and restrictions as the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe. That is not in the existing law. There is great force, there is great justice in it, and there is almost a public necessity of some provision of that kind, properly guarded, being in the law.

So I think we ought to deal with this matter upon the theory that it is going back to the conference committee, and outline somewhat in the Senate here what we think the conferees on the part of the Senate ought to do with respect to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want to occupy much time.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has just mentioned the provision about the transportation of laborers which was put into the Senate amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota. It is in line 10 of the Senate amendment, which is stricken out, on page 5. I call attention to the fact that it is not confined to agricultural laborers, but includes any laborers, and you can follow the language down and you can discover that under it, by interpreting it between the lines, it means that the railroads would have the power and right to transport strike breakers to any point on their line where they needed labor.

Mr. SPOONER. The argument was directed——

Mr. TILLMAN. I know to what the argument was directed, but I want to show you——

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the Senator. The argument was directed to the necessity for the free transportation of agricultural labor.

All I have to say about that is this: If the language is not apt, if it needs to be more restrictive, it is entirely within the power of the conference committee to change it so as to confine it specifically to a purpose which is entirely legitimate and necessary.

Mr. President, railway companies have been in the habit of sending their cars, their general managers, their directors, their officers to every part of the United States, and of sending their advertising agents into all parts of the United States soliciting business. It is in the public interest that that should continue. It is in the public interest that the railway carriers should send their exposition cars into different parts of the country. There are many arguments in favor of this, and there is no argument to be made against it. As I said the other day, under the provisions of this amendment as it was first introduced, and under the provisions of this amendment as it comes back to us from the conference committee, if an engineer or a conductor or a fireman on an interstate train were mortally wounded and lay in a hospital in some distant city far from his home, it would be unlawful for the company to transport free of charge his wife and children to be at his bedside when he breathed his last. There is no sense in it, and it ought to be changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to another point. There was a great fire in Baltimore a short time ago, and it was necessary to bring fire departments from all the surrounding cities.

Mr. SPOONER. That happens often.

Mr. McCUMBER. But under this provision as now reported it would be impossible for a railroad company to carry them free.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. That often happens. The language should be elastic. There should be power left, under proper restriction, for the railway companies to do those things which humanity demands of them, which the public interest demands of them, and out of which no possible abuse or harm can arise.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could not the Senator from Wisconsin, who is very resourceful——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean that as a compliment?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator knows I mean precisely what I say. Could he not help the conferees by drafting some provision which would be a positive and direct prohibition against some people, and not let the prohibition be general, and then have a regiment of exceptions, but have the prohibition specific and no exceptions? In other words, pick out the men whom you do not want to ride free, and leave the railroads to haul all the balance of creation for nothing if they want to.

Mr. SPOONER. I will gladly render any assistance in my power. If the Senator is in favor of that proposition, it will be easy to accomplish his purpose. I am not in favor of it. I think the rule should be prohibitive and that those who are to be permitted to be carried free should be specific exceptions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that in the public mind all the agitation and the dissatisfaction in regard to free transportation is because of the belief—I presume it must be based on good grounds—that the railroads use free passes and things of that kind to indirectly or directly bribe lawyers, officers, and other people—legislators, Congressmen, Senators, and everybody else?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from South Carolina keeps on, he will have the rule established in a few moments. I have said——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin why the provisions of the act of 1895, which amended the original interstate-commerce act of 1887, are not broad enough?

Mr. SPOONER. I think they are broad enough, probably.

Mr. KNOX. They would include the cases you have just mentioned, about the transportation of fire engines and doing everything else for municipal purposes, charitable purposes, and they also include the right to give employees of the railroad, or the employees of any other railroad, free transportation. The language of that act, if the Senator does not have his hand on it, is as follows:

SEC. 22. That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the boards of managers of said homes; nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me for a moment?

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me, if the Senator from South Carolina will just allow me to finish my sentence, that all the worthy cases that it seems necessary and humane and proper to provide for are covered by the provisions of the existing law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me——

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the trouble, then; and why did the Senate break out in a new place, to use a slang phrase, and run amuck on free passes?

Mr. KNOX. Not myself having indulged in it, I can not answer the question. I made no suggestion——

Mr. TILLMAN. Perhaps I am criticising the Senate unduly, but if we have enough law and the lawyers here know it is enough law, why did they vote for these things and tumble over each other in their effort to do so? Is it not because the punishment in the old law is inadequate; that there is no effective legislation on the books?

Mr. KNOX. Add the penalty. Make any penalty you see fit.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, perhaps, our road would be very plain and we could follow it——

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am not disposed to take much part in the discussion of the report of the conference committee. As one of the conferees, I feel rather that we ought to listen and take advice from the Senate as to the places where we made mistakes, if we made any. So far as I am concerned I was against such an amendment in relation to passes as finally got into the bill, and resisted it as long as I thought it was proper for me to do so. I have not said this before, because I felt a little delicacy in referring to what took place in the conference committee, but I think in justice to myself I have a right to say that much.

Now, what I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin is whether he would be willing—I am doing this because I want to find out what the Senate is for—to strike out the provision in the bill, which we agreed to and put in the bill, prohibiting all passes, and relegate the whole thing back to the law as it now stands?

In the first place, the law of 1887 was not as extensive in its latitude permitting the granting of passes as it became afterwards when the bill was passed to which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] referred. But the original act, as modified by other acts subsequently passed, made this latitude very broad. I supposed all the time that it was as broad as it ought to be, and possibly it might be said to be too broad, in view of the opposition to passes that has been exhibited in this country for some years past. I desire to find out if we were to go into conference again and say, "We will not agree to this absolute prohibition," and if we could get an agreement resting upon the present law as it stands, whether it would be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is very clear, I think, from what has been said that if this bill contains no provision whatever on the subject of passes, the law of 1895, which I read in the beginning of my remarks, will be in force with penalties, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator will find penalties for a violation of any provision of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is true. The act of 1895 is not quite as broad as the amendment agreed to by the Senate, and I think this is an improvement upon it in some respects. Under the act of 1895 it was possible for a railroad to give a free pass to a minister. There are cases where it ought to be permitted to do it.

Mr. CULLOM. As a matter of fact, I have not read the law of 1895 for some little time, and hence I do not remember accurately the classes that are exempt.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senate conferees, upon their statement here, were compelled by the House conferees to yield everything and to consent to this absolute prohibition. I am antagonizing——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator in this connection what is probably more a parliamentary question than otherwise, and that is this: The House bill containing no prohibition against the issuance of passes, and the bill as it passed the Senate containing a prohibition, are not the conferees bound to accept one or the other?

Mr. SPOONER. I think they are.

Mr. CULBERSON. The House bill or the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. CULBERSON. They can not amend either?

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the rules of the Senate is it possible to accept the amendment as brought in by the conferees in this case, because that is neither the House bill nor the bill as it passed the Senate, but it is an amendment of the bill as it passed the Senate in that respect. I say it is more a parliamentary question than otherwise. I should like to be informed about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The inquiry of the Senator from Texas opens an entirely new phase. I was under the impression, based upon the little experience I have had on conference committees, that where disagreements have been had, the conferees are not limited to adopting one provision or the other, but they can arrange a compromise proposition. They are not estopped from changing the language.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is true.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply inquired for information in order to know what the rule was.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the matter was open.

Mr. CULBERSON. As a matter of fact, the conferees have brought in a recommendation that has not passed either House.

Mr. SPOONER. That often happens. I think the subject was open to the conferees. The Senate had passed an anti-pass provision; the House disagreed to it, and in that status the conferees were appointed. The conference committee could have recommended that the House recede. It could modify the proposition passed by the Senate, and recommend that the Senate concur. They have done that. I do not think their hands are tied as to the precise provision upon a subject which we submit to them as an open proposition which they may recommend, each to the body which appointed them.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has laid down the rule correctly. I only want to emphasize what he said.

It was in the power of the conference committee to modify what the Senate had put in which was new. I think in this case, as the Senator from Texas says, they went beyond their power when they repealed, practically, the act existing to-day, which our amendment did not repeal, but only modified.

Mr. SPOONER. We proposed, technically, the repeal of the existing law by substituting a new law for it covering the same subject.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; but it was not a total repeal. It was a modification of the law. This is an absolute repeal.

Mr. SPOONER. Our proposition, if enacted, would have repealed the section of the law of 1895, because, dealing with the same subject, it would be a substitute for it.

Mr. TELLER. We left in our amendment the law, but we modified it. We did not destroy it absolutely. This amendment destroys it absolutely.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it was competent for the conferees to submit that proposition to the Senate in place of ours.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think so.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to say that I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin entirely. Whenever a subject-matter is committed to the conference committee, they can either modify or enlarge; either one.

Mr. SPOONER. I am antagonizing the House proposition. I come to this. We provided that the railway carriers might grant free passes "to ministers of religion, local and traveling secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations." Why not? They are not organized for financial profit. They are moved in their organization or association, which is voluntary, by the highest aspirations. They are organized to do good.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is all very interesting and instructive, but if the Senator is going around up and down the country to hunt up subjects that are worthy, I think he can expand the Senate amendment, which is already broad enough to take in 10,000,000 people, it is said. There are poor teachers and college professors, and I do not know how many other worthy classes in the country.

Mr. HALE. Sunday schools.

Mr. TILLMAN. Sunday schools and every other kind of thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Impecunious doctors.

Mr. TILLMAN. The more the Senator will consider the various phases of this subject, the more difficult he will find it to know where to stop. If you are going to exempt the secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations dealing with railway employees and going from one State to another, then somebody will say, "Why not give the same privilege to the other Christian associations?" Take a case where the secretaries live in towns, and are bubbling over with humanitarian feelings and philanthrophy, and want to go around and help some other poor fellow somewhere, or aid in the work of the Railroad Christian Associations. Why not except secretaries and all that kind of thing? We have to stop somewhere, or else leave it as it is now—a humbug.

Mr. SPOONER. I was about to suggest, if the Senator's avalanche had been withheld, that this might properly be restricted to the branch of the Young Men's Christian Association which has relation directly and is organized for the purpose of dealing with the railway employees of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Why not include the entire membership of Young Men's Christian Associations?

Mr. SPOONER. Why not include the Senate? Why not include everybody?

Mr. HALE. We have included almost everybody.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. HALE. Pretty much, in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I think not. There are certainly 70,000,000 people who are not included.

Mr. HALE. Are about 10,000,000 included?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not suppose all of them will get a pass. In the amendment as we adopted we also excepted "inmates of hospitals and charitable and eleemosynary institutions; indigent, destitute, and homeless persons."

Ought railroad carriers to be prohibited from giving free transportation to such as are properly accredited to be in these classes?

Mr. HALE. Why not put in "all poor and impoverished persons?"

Mr. SPOONER. That is different.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but it is charity.

Mr. SPOONER. That is rate regulation run mad. If there is to be a legislative embargo upon charity and mercy and humanity——

Mr. HALE. I think we are trying to get at practical results. Why not limit this to the actual employees of the railroads?

Mr. TILLMAN. And their families, of course.

Mr. HALE. And their families. Why go outside of that? When we do—when we go outside into the domain either of charity and beneficence, or into other business—we open a wide door. I should like to see an amendment agreed to by both Houses that would confine this matter of passes to the employees of railroads and their families, and nobody else. When you begin to include one class of beneficiaries because they are worthy—a religious organization or, as a Senator suggests, a live-stock association—then why not lumbermen's associations and all of the agricultural and business departments? Why not confine ourselves to a provision, I dislike to repeat, that will except railroad employees and their families, and leave it there?

Mr. SPOONER. The law on this subject, ever since 1895, has been as follows:

That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the boards of managers of said Homes.

Has the Senator ever heard of any abuse of it?

Mr. HALE. I have heard of a great many abuses of this pass system which to me were a great surprise. I heard in every field where passes are issued, either by favoritism or by classes, of very great and inexcusable abuses, notwithstanding that statute, which I think goes too far. I would confine it—and I hope that will be the outcome of this—so that for a year to come at least passes shall only be issued to railway employees and their families.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope that the committee at least will stand by the act of 1895.

Mr. TILLMAN. With a punitive clause in it?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. There is a clause already in the bill——

Mr. TILLMAN. What does that amount to? How much punishment? Do you mean to put the punishment for a violation of the new law in the act of 1895?

Mr. SPOONER. It is there now.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, that, of course, the conferees could adopt the provisions of the law of 1895 and put them in the present law. They could compromise upon that.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I say I hope they will do not less than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the pains and penalties of the present law would apply.

Mr. McCREARY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if he has read the law of 1895.

Mr. SPOONER. I have; and the Senator from Pennsylvania read it, and I now hand it to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am in favor of the employees of railroads having the privilege of receiving passes for themselves and their families. It has been done for years. I think they are entitled to it. I agree with him in that proposition. I have not examined the act of 1895, but I think that the amendment as reported by the conferees is entirely too drastic, and I am not in favor of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Another amendment was adopted, which authorized the railroad carriers in interstate commerce to give transportation to officers of the brotherhoods of railway trainmen. That is dropped out of the bill. I refer to the amendment authorizing the giving of free transportation to the officers of railway trainmen brotherhoods—the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Conductors, etc.

Mr. TILLMAN. Everything that was in the Senate amendment was knocked out.

Mr. SPOONER. No; that was a separate amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. We put the free-pass amendments in the two sections of the bill, or the two paragraphs of the bill together, and dealt with the whole free-pass subject in the manner we did.

Mr. SPOONER. Those organizations are created by the train men.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to the page where the amendment he is now discussing appears. It is an entirely different section from the other. It is on page 32, amendment numbered 45.

Mr. SPOONER. It was an amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and adopted by the Senate, I think, without objection, as follows:

SEC. 16b. Nothing in this act shall prevent any common carrier subject to its provisions from giving free transportation or reduced rates to the officers of the organizations of such employees for the purpose of transacting the business of such organizations with such railroads: Provided, That such reduced rates or free transportation are not issued with the view of discriminating in favor of or against any particular class of employees.

Mr. TILLMAN. A very proper provision; but will the Senator recall the fact, by looking at the report, that of the fifty-one amendments proposed by the Senate the Senate conferees obtained the consent of the House conferees to forty-five or forty-six, and that we practically got everything we asked for? We had to give something.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the committee did well.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the lecturing we are receiving it would appear that a great many people are dissatisfied with what we did.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; the Senator ought not to regard it as lecturing or in the nature of a stricture upon the action of the committee. It is simply a fair statement of Senators here of their antagonism to the proposition which was reported by the committee, and which was insisted upon, as it is said, by the conferees on the part of the House.

I venture to say it is impossible adequately to express the obligation of the railroad employees of the United States, the railway carriers of the United States, and the people of the United States to the officers of these railway organizations. They are able men. They have maintained their contracts. They have been "courts of conciliation." They have been wise and tactful and manly. They have prevented strikes where they would have been ruinous and unnecessary. They have maintained cordial and friendly relations between the carriers and the employees to a wonderful extent, and they have illustrated splendidly, in my opinion, the legitimate function of the organization of men who work for wages to accomplish great results. It is in the public interest that every possible facility should be afforded for frequent conferences between these men and the officials of the various railway companies of the United States. They are ex-trainmen, they belong each to his brotherhood, they have all had experience in the operation of railways, and there is no reason why they should not be put upon the same basis exactly as actual railway employees. I object strenuously, Mr. President, to any proposition which prevents the interstate common carriers from giving freely to their employees and their families, and to the officers of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, free transportation as heretofore has been done.

Now, Mr. President, I pass for a moment from that to another provision in this conference report. It has been criticised as beyond the power of the conference committee. I do not think that is a just criticism. It is to be found on pages 6 and 7 of the conference report. As we passed it it provided that—

> Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall promptly, upon application of any shipper tendering interstate traffic for transportation, construct, maintain, and operate upon reasonable terms a switch connection with any private side track which may be constructed to connect with its railroad, where such connection is reasonably practicable and can be put in with safety and will furnish sufficient business to justify the construction and maintenance of the same.

The conference committee inserted "any lateral branch line of railroad, or of." Then follow the words: "Any shipper tendering interstate traffic for transportation." That is all qualified by the language before that in the section. It deals with precisely the same subject. It simply enlarges the class so as to take in the lateral branch lines of railroads with the shipper. I think it was open to that modification and that the committee of conference did not exceed its authority in incorporating it.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think it is a wise provision to incorporate in the bill. I think—and I have had in my life some opportunity to form an accurate opinion about it—it is a very important provision. Many times I have known short lines of railroad connecting with a trunk line or a long line of railroad, constructed for some special purpose and a common carrier.

I fancy that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has known of the same thing—to carry lumber, if you please, or some other commodity to reach raw materials to be developed into finished products and find somewhere a market. But, Mr. President, it has very often happened that the men who put their money into the construction of such railroads have found themselves at one end of it practically in a pocket. They would be denied connections and prorating upon any fair basis. They have been frozen out repeatedly of their ownership because of the impossibility of operating under the unfair restrictions, and have been obliged in the end to sell their railroads at a great loss to the single company with whose road they were connected.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think I disagree with the Senator as to the merits, which he has been discussing, of this amendment, but on the point of its being new matter, this proposition, which is a substantive proposition, was taken up as a separate matter when the bill was before the Senate. It was discussed and voted upon, and voted down. It seems to me that that constitutes it a distinct and a new proposition. It was not in the bill as passed by the House. It did not come to us from the House. We took it up as a separate proposition from the switches and spur tracks and decided that we would not put it in the bill. It seems to me if the conference committee is going to be able to take a substantive proposition that the Senate voted down and put it into a bill it enlarges their powers very much.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me a minute, it is no more a substantive proposition than the proposition in regard to passes, which was proposed by the House conferees and accepted reluctantly by the Senate conferees.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senate did not vote down the pass proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senate by voting down an amendment proposed to a section thereby prevents the conferees on the part of the House from proposing it as a modification of the Senate proposition.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is correct to a certain extent, but if the House has not brought forward any proposition upon this matter and the Senate seeks to put in a new proposition and that proposition fails then certainly there is nothing for the conferees to consider.

Mr. SPOONER. I think when the House of Representatives refused to agree to this section which the Senate had proposed, it was open when it was sent to conference——

Mr. LODGE. It was not properly open to new matter.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Massachusetts says that it was not properly open to new matter. That begs the question.

Mr. HALE. What was before the conferees? It may be that I do not know the facts, but if the House had nothing in the bill that covered this matter and the Senate voted down everything covering the matter, what had the conferees to consider?

Mr. SPOONER. This is what the Senate did——

Mr. HALE. It is not a question of what the Senate did, but the fundamental thing in a conference report is that nothing shall be put in that neither House has considered or adopted. If there is nothing put in by either House, then clearly the conferees have no jurisdiction.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 6, amendment 6, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Maine, the provision is that—

> Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall promptly, upon application of any shipper tendering interstate traffic for transportation, construct, maintain, and operate upon reasonable terms a switch connection with any private side track which may be constructed to connect with its railroad, where such connection is reasonably practicable and can be put in with safety and will furnish sufficient business to justify the construction and maintenance of the same.

Now, that is in a section which was in the bill as passed by the House and which the Senate amended. It is precisely the same subject-matter. It relates to a compulsory connection upon fair terms.

Mr. LODGE. That was not in the bill as passed by the House. It was our amendment.

Mr. HALE. Was that provision in the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it was. I am not sure. The argument is all the stronger if it were not.

Mr. HALE. I agree, if that proposition was in the bill as passed by the House, and was therefore before the conferees, they had a right to consider it. But if it was not in the bill as passed by the House and an amendment was offered in the Senate and voted down, then clearly it was beyond the jurisdiction of the conferees.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. On a paragraph of new matter relating to connections between railroads and a private side track, we will say, and there are no side tracks unless those side tracks come from something—some man who has some factory or some mine or something to take the product—does the Senator from Maine contend that the House conferees have no right to say to us, "You want connection with a private side track. We will grant you that provided you will put in here a provision that there shall be connection between spur railroads?"

Mr. HALE. No; I do not. If the Senate had voted in an amendment and had made it a part of the business of the business of the conferees, then, undoubtedly, they would have jurisdiction.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is exactly what we did.

Mr. HALE. But if the House did not put anything in and the Senate voted down the proposition, then the conferees had no jurisdiction.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator from Maine entirely misunderstands the situation, because if he will examine the amendment numbered 6 at the bottom of page 6 and the top of page 7, the Senate amendment relating to this very subject, he will see what the Senate put in. All the House did was to ask us to incorporate the words "any lateral branch line of railroad," so as to make the provision put in by the Senate, which was applicable to private side tracks, applicable to spur railroads and lateral railroads.

Mr. HALE. I think that depends upon whether the Senate put it in.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate did put it in.

Mr. HALE. I am told the Senate did not put it in.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine can look at the bill; he will see for himself.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, to me this is a pretty plain proposition. The Senate passed this provision—it was not in the House bill—requiring railway carriers to connect with a private switch where it could be done properly and sufficient business was promised. We sent that to the House of Representatives. They disagreed to the amendment. I am trying to convince the Senator from Maine, for whom I have the profoundest possible deference.

Mr. HALE. I am trying to listen to the Senator. It is a very easy task.

Mr. SPOONER. We sent this provision to the House requiring interstate railroad carriers to connect with private switch the shipper when it could reasonably be done, and when it promised sufficient business to warrant it. The House disagreed to the proposition, and therefore the bill went with that disagreement to the conference committee.

Now, it seems to me that in that committee it was entirely an open question. The House could have refused to agree to any of it, for it was a Senate amendment to the House bill. The House could agree to it with an amendment if it chose to insist upon an amendment. That is what occurred. The House says, "As you are providing for compulsory connection with a private switch under certain restrictions, we will agree to that if you enlarge the class tendering or constructing the switch. If you will allow lateral roads which have switches to make connection with the carrier, where it is practicable and where it promises business enough to warrant it, we will agree to the Senate amendment." It seems to me very clear that that was entirely within the competency of the House conferees to propose and of the Senate conferees to agree to.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, a moment further. The only argument which can be made against it, I fancy, is the argument based upon the fact that it had been offered in the Senate and voted down by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I was going to address myself to that subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to address myself to that for a moment.

Mr. HALE. I want to anticipate the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. HALE. If the subject-matter is in the bill by the provisions of the House, although a Senate amendment to that has been rejected, I do not think the conferees are forbidden to consider it. If the subject-matter is in the bill in the House provision, although the Senate has voted down an amendment, I think it is in the competency of the conferees to amend the provision by the very provision that the Senate has struck out. It is not the question of what the Senate does, but the fundamental underlying question is whether the subject-matter is in the provision as sent by the House to the Senate. I do not think the conferees are obliged to reject an amendment even if the Senate has rejected it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is absolutely correct. I knew he would be.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment, please. Now, the question is, Is the subject-matter in the amendment sent by the Senate to the House?

Mr. LODGE. There can be no doubt it was germane. I do not think there can be the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well, Mr. President. Then if it is germane, if the subject-matter was there——

Mr. LODGE. It was there very properly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is there properly, and it was perfectly competent for the House to enlarge the operation of the same subject-matter, and that is what they did. I am glad that the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts concur in my view of the proposition that this was in order.

Now, Mr. President, continuing for just a moment—and my time has been taken up by interruptions—is it a wise provision? It is a provision without which the construction of hundreds of lateral lines, which would have been in the interest of the people, has been discouraged during all the years, for the reason that men did not dare to invest their money in the construction of lateral roads when there was no means whatever of securing fair treatment at that end of it which connected with a trunk line, if I may so speak of the railroad upon which they depended to get to a market. It has been a discouragement to the construction of lines which ought to have been constructed. There is no good reason why a railway carrier engaged in interstate commerce should be required to make a private switch with the private track of a shipper who is proposing to tender traffic and that a lateral railroad which tenders traffic in vastly greater volume and affecting beneficially large numbers of people and sections of the State or Territory should not have the same right.

Mr. HALE. What is the significance actually and practically, different from a switch, of the words "a lateral railroad?"

Mr. SPOONER. A lateral railroad is built from the side. It may be 20 miles; it may be 10 miles; it may be 50 miles; it may be 100 miles.

Mr. HALE. But is an independent line?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. It is only associated with the trunk line by physical connection?

Mr. SPOONER. It is associated with the trunk line in this, that it brings the trunk line business.

Mr. HALE. It is an independent organization?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. It is not a competitor; only a feeder.

Mr. HALE. It is a feeder?

Mr. SPOONER. That is all.

Mr. HALE. And it is only associated with the trunk line by its connection, which brings business?

Mr. SPOONER. That is all.

Mr. ELKINS. It is a switch connection.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from West Virginia says it is a switch connection. It is more than that.

Mr. ELKINS. It has to be a switch connection.

Mr. SPOONER. To state it shortly, it is such connection as will enable the transfer of cars from one to the other interchangeably.

Mr. HALE. But it is not what we commonly understand by a switch connection of short lines of the road itself; it is independent.

Mr. SPOONER. It is independent.

Mr. HALE. It is not a switch connection.

Mr. SPOONER. A firm, a coal company, or a group of independent coal-mining companies are unable to get cars, they are unable to obtain switches, they are unable to connect with the line upon which they are dependent to get to market, and they may organize a little company and build 10 miles or 20 miles of railroad. Of course it is a common carrier; it has to be. Constructing that road to a connection with the long line engaged in interstate commerce, there is every reason in the world why, upon fair terms, it should be permitted to connect with that railroad, so as to be able to secure an interchange of traffic and cars on fair terms.

Mr. HALE. Through transportation?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. Now, that is all this is. It will apply and be of great value in respect to coal production; it will apply and be of great value in respect of lumber production, and it will apply and be of great value for very many purposes which I need not take the time to go over. This is very important in many ways to the public, and is perfectly competent for the conferees to agree to.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator is through on that amendment, I should like to ask him if he has any question that the two amendments on page 21 are new matter? On page 21 the words in line 9 "or transportation," and in line 17 the words "rates or," I think, give a very changed significance to that whole section.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the statement I made yesterday morning I said distinctly that the conferees knew it was new matter and had no authority to insert it, and we threw ourselves on the mercy of the Senate. I said I did not come in here with any effort to deceive them, but I told them that we had exceeded our authority.

Mr. LODGE. It is admitted that it is new matter.

Mr. SPOONER. It is agreed to be new matter, and if it were not agreed to be new matter I have very grave doubt whether the amendment does not mean a great deal more in its legal effect than the conferees would be willing to sanction. What are the other pages?

Mr. LODGE. On pages 40 and 41 are found the amendments which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] admits to be new matter.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I apologize for having taken so much of the time of the Senate, although I think most of it has been occupied by interruptions.

Mr. TILLMAN. The amendment on page 41, of course, is new matter, but I am still in doubt about it, as I said yesterday. I asked Mr. Cleaves, whose expert knowledge and experience in this matter is well worthy of our respect and consideration, whether he considered the words in regard to the salary of the secretary of the Commission and the new office to be created was new matter, and he said: "I do not know, for you had to deal with the composition of the Commission, and the House conferees insisted on your putting back the House provision. I think probably it was within the province of the conferees to suggest this matter; but that, of course, is a question for the Senate."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator's citation of the opinion of the old veteran clerk of the Committee on Appropriations reminds one of the college story of the boy who was refused admission. When his father asked him why they shut him out, he said he did not know; that he had answered every question. His father asked what was the first question. The boy replied that it was "In what year did Columbus discover America?" "Did you answer that?" "Yes." "What did you say?" "I said I did not know." [Laughter.] Now, the citation of the opinion of the veteran clerk is simply that he does not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President, in view of the fact—I want to do Mr. Cleaves entire justice—that he compiled, under the instruction, of course, of the veteran chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the manual of the Senate on the subject of conference reports, their powers, limitations, duties, and all the history of the whole thing. It was not a case of mere offhand decision; but I think he was very much in doubt as to whether or not the conferees in this case had exceeded their authority.

Mr. HALE. But the result of it all was that the clerk did not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine only has his opinion.

Mr. HALE. I want to trust the conferees very largely, and give them large discretion; but I do not think on this matter, on which there seems to be so much diversity of opinion——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say to the Senator from Maine, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that I do not want to delay the termination of this matter any longer, and, so far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for the Senate conferees—we will submit that proposition in a joint resolution, which will be introduced to cover the amendment on page 41, the sixty-days' provision, unless the Senate might now, if it be permissible, grant the conferees unanimous consent to retain the new matter on the last page.

Mr. HALE. No; the Senate, I think, can not do that. It will not with my consent. I think, when the conferees present a joint resolution, that it had better be confined—but that is discretionary as to the matter of the time when the act shall take effect——

Mr. TILLMAN. Would not the Senate have it within its power to amend the joint resolution and vote down anything we might submit after it is in? That is what I want to know.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; but I suggst to the Senator not to complicate that most important question, upon which every vote of the Senate will be given to pass a joint resolution to extend the time to sixty days, because of the necessity for getting the machinery at work. I suggest to the Senate and to the chairman of the conference committee not to complicate that question with anything else. Such a resolution as he suggests will go through, as such resolutions have many a time, without a single objection, and will cover that point; but the other matter is for the discretion of the conferees.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. I shall, after putting in the motion which I send to the desk. I want to submit a motion. I do not want to have an ironclad construction, but I want the vote of the Senate upon the order which I now send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an order, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Mr. HALE moves, as an expression of the views of the Senate:

That passes issued by railroad corporations included in this bill be confined to actual employees of such railroads and their families.

Mr. HALE. I want a vote on that.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, we have been listening for nearly a day to a discussion on the subject of new matter introduced by the pending conference report. Is there anything to prohibit, or, in other words, is it not, after all, a matter for the Senate to pass upon? The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] shakes his head and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] shakes his head. I desire to call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to what I find in the Senate report upon the subject of conferences and conference reports. I have discovered upon reading it that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] played a very important part in having the rule to which I call the attention of the Senate established. This matter is found on page 16 of that report in reference to conferences and conference reports:

29. Conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House. (1414–1417.) (50th Cong., 1st sess., Sen. Jour., pp. 1064, 1065; 54th Cong., 2d sess., Sen. Jour., pp. 90, 91, 96.)

That is Rule XXIX.

In the House, in case such matter is included, the conference report may be ruled out on a point of order. (See Rule 50, below.)

In the Senate, in case such matter is included, the custom is to submit the question of order to the Senate.

Then there is the following note:

NOTE.—In the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, Vice-President Hobart, in overruling a point of order made on this ground against a conference report during its reading in the Senate, stated that the report having been adopted by one House and being now submitted for discussion and decision in the form of concurrence or disagreement, it is not in the province of the Chair during the progress of its presentation to decide that matter has been inserted which is new or not relevant, but that such questions should go before the Senate when it comes to vote on the adoption or rejection of the report. (55th Cong., 1st sess., Sen. Jour., pp. 171, 172; Cong. Rec., pp. 2780–2787.) See also Cong. Rec., p. 2827, 56th Cong., 2d. sess., when the Presiding Officer (Mr. LODGE in the chair) referred with approval to the foregoing decision of Vice-President Hobart, and stated that when a point of order is made on a conference report on the ground that new matter has been inserted, the Chair should submit the question to the Senate instead of deciding it himself, as has been the custom in the House. No formal ruling was made in this case, however, as the conference report, after debate, was, by unanimous consent, rejected. (56th Cong., 2d sess., Cong. Rec., pp. 2826–2883.)

As I read this, it can have no other meaning than that if the point is raised that something that is found in a conference report is new matter, when called to the attention of the Senate, the Senate itself acts upon it.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PATTERSON. And if the Senate decides it is not, or whatever may be the reason or motive of the Senate, the Senate has it in its power to retain that matter in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. That is only a matter of procedure; but the fundamental proposition which the Senator from Colorado has raised is that there shall be no new matter inserted. Our processes are different from those of the House. I think, in the prevailing tendency of conferees to usurp power, that we have got to adopt—and I hope we shall do so before this session ends—the House rule, that such insertions shall be subject to a point of order and ruled out; but we have not gone as far as that. We have said the conferees should not put in new matter and that the question shall be submitted to the Senate; but it does not change the underlying and absolutely necessary proposition that no new matter shall be incorporated by the conferees.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The general parliamentary law and also the practice of both Houses is, of course, that there shall be no new matter in a conference report—that is, no matter which has not been adopted by one of the two Houses.

In the House of Representatives the point of order lies, and the Chair decides. If the Chair decides that the matter is new matter, and therefore out of order, the conference report is rejected by that finding of the Chair. All that any parliamentary body can do with a conference report is to accept it or reject it. It can not amend it. It must be either accepted or rejected.

The point of order, when it lies in the House and is ruled on by the Speaker and sustained, carries with it the rejection of the report, just as when the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the House sustains a point of order against a clause in an appropriation bill it carries with it the rejection of that clause.

Here, if the point of order is made, it has been held by Vice-President Hobart, in a ruling which I sustained later when I happened to be in the chair, that the point of order must be submitted to the Senate. Therefore it comes down to the Senate as a question whether they shall reject the conference report on the ground that there is new matter contained in it.

That is the state of the parliamentary law, as I understand it, in this body; but that does not change the fundamental parliamentary proposition that conference committees have no right to put into conference reports matter which has not been adopted by either House.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, to a certain extent, and to a very considerable extent, the Senator from Massachusetts is right; but, after all, the ruling by the Senate recognizes, if not the right, at least the power of conference committees to insert new matter in a measure.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. PATTERSON. I beg your pardon. It is simply reaching a conclusion by different processes. Even in the other House, Mr. President, I imagine, should the Speaker sustain the point of order that a proposition contained in a conference report is new matter, that decision might be appealed from.

Mr. LODGE. The House could accept new matter by unanimous consent undoubtedly, and we could accept new matter by a majority vote; but that does not make it in order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well, then, so far as the House is concerned. In other words, both the Senate and the House can accept, if they choose, new matter of legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PATTERSON. While the rule is a good rule and should as a general proposition be enforced, I have no hesitation in maintaining in a case of this kind, and as to a bill of this character, that when the conferees meet for the purpose of discussing a matter and reaching an agreement, if they discover that there is something needed to make a measure effective as a whole, they have not only the power, but it is their duty to insert that, and then submit it both to the House and to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. But, Mr. President, does the Senator not see the far-reaching, dangerous, and disastrous results of his proposition? Legislation is matured here and in the House of Representatives. Conferees are not a legislative body. They are to confine themselves to disagreements between the two Houses and to report only as to those.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand precisely.

Mr. HALE. But when the Senator says the conferees have a right, when they believe that in order to make a measure effective they may put in new propositions, he is transferring the legislative power, which ought to be confined to the two bodies, to a conference committee that is only appointed and constituted not to newly legislate, but to consider differences between the two Houses.

The Senator is not a radical Senator; he is a conservative Senator, and he ought to see the wide and far-reaching and dangerous proposition which he has made, that the conferees can take upon themselves the power of legislation that only inheres in the two bodies.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, it is right there that I disagree with the Senator from Maine. It is not a case of a conference committee taking upon itself legislative power; it is simply a conference committee reviewing the measure as it is sent to them, discovering that there is a defect or something that ought to be in to make the bill effective, and then in their report suggesting it to the Senate and also to the House. It is utterly impossible for the conference committee to legislate. It can only in its report refer the matter back to the Senate, and then the matter that is suggested is before the Senate to be discussed, to be considered, to be voted upon, to be rejected, or to be adopted. That is all there is of it. It is not a usurpation in any sense of the word; and I sincerely hope that the conference committee, if the conference committee believes that there are omissions in the bill, and that some slight amendments will make the bill more effective, will stand by them, and let the Senate as a body, after full discussion, determine whether they shall be a part of the measure.

It is simply another method of legislation, a different method of initiation, and, after all, passed upon as solemnly and as deliberately by the Senate and by the House as though the proposition had been originally introduced and sent to a committee, or as though the amendment had been originally offered in open Seante while the bill was under discussion.

For that reason, Mr. President, leaving this standing, I could not comprehend why so much time was taken up in attempting to establish that this proposition or that proposition or another proposition was new matter. The conferees have brought subjects connected with this great legislation before the Senate and asked the view of the Senate upon them, and if the Senate stands by the conference committee, provided the House agrees, their recommendations will be incorporated into the body of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Colorado had pushed his inquiries as far as page 15 of the document from which he has read, he would have seen that it is not in order to give such instructions to conferees as would require changes in the text to which both Houses have agreed. We can not, even by the instructions of a unanimous Senate, direct our conferees to make a change in a text to which both Houses have agreed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me read to the Senator from Massachusetts from the same document, on page 15, the page to which the Senator refers me:

21. It is in order to instruct conferees, and the resolution of instruction should be offered after the House has voted to insist and ask a conference and before the conferees have been appointed.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but we can not instruct them to make a change in the text that has been agreed to; or, in other words, we can not instruct them to introduce new matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LODGE. Let me say just a word, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question in this connection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator from Massachusetts say that if the conference committee reports that it is admittedly new matter there is no legislative way by which that could be incorporated into the measure?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that there is, Mr. President, and I do not think there ought to be; and if our rules permit it, the sooner, in the protection of the Senate and of legislation, that we amend those rules the better.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts another question, then. Let us carry it to its logical conclusion. If the conferees make a report incorporating new matter, and the point of order is made that it is new matter, and the Senate votes it down, and then the motion is made to agree to the report, is not that, so far as the Senate is concerned, a part of the measure?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly that is the case under the Senate's practice.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is what I have been contending.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly that is the case under the Senate's practice, and that is the reason, I think, our rules ought to be amended and made like the rules of the House of Representatives, so that if the point of order is sustained and it is held that it is new matter—of course if the Chair holds that it is not new matter, then it is not liable to rejection—but if it is new matter, and held to be new matter, that that mere fact shall reject the conference report and send it back. We are dealing in a conference with the work of both Houses, and we are not proposing that six representatives of those Houses shall be allowed to introduce new matter which neither House has ever adopted.

Mr. PILES obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire just a moment. It is admitted by the Senator from Massachusetts that the result I have suggested may be secured in a perfectly legitimate way under the rules.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PILES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to say that the Senator from Colorado misunderstood me. If the point of order is made here in the Senate, and submitted to the Senate, and if the Senate holds that it is not new matter, of course it goes in.

Mr. PATTERSON. But you can not inquire into the motives of Senators.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senate holds it is not new matter, it is not new matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. But you can not inquire into the motives of Senators when they vote upon the proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Of course not.

Mr. PATTERSON. We know it has constantly been the practice of the Senate to sustain or to overrule a decision of the Chair upon questions connected with measures, Senators voting in accordance with their view of the very right of the measure itself.

Mr. LODGE. On the question of relevancy.

Mr. PATTERSON. And they may do the same thing on matters contained in a conference report. In other words, it carries out what I have heard Senators boast of so frequently, that this body can always have its way under its rules, and when this body determines that a certain measure should contain certain provisions, so far as this body is concerned there is nothing in its rules that will prevent their insertion in the measure. No hard and fast parliamentary rule can prevent such being the case.

Mr. President, time and time again I have, in my short service in the Senate, seen the Chair submit questions of order to the Senate, not because the Chair was in doubt, but because the Chair wanted the Senate to have its way as to whether a particular matter should or should not be inserted in a bill. That is all there is in connection with this matter.

We have a right, under the rules, if we think on a conference report that a certain thing should be in the bill when it ultimately becomes a law, so far as this body is concerned, to do our part in putting it in. Of course it requires the concurrence of both Houses; but when, in whatever method, on a conference report or otherwise, the mind of the House and the mind of the Senate jointly meet, then all that remains, if it is the enactment of a bill, is the signature of the President to make it a law.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator from Colorado takes his seat, I will say that if, under our rules, the question of relevancy can be submitted to the Senate, and if the Senate declares that an amendment proposed to an appropriation bill is relevant, then it is relevant and it goes in. But that is not equivalent to saying that irrelevant matter can go in. In the same way——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. Let me finish. If the Senate decides that the matter against which the point of order is made is not new matter, then, of course, not being new matter, it is entitled to go in, in the same way as if the Speaker should decide in the House, when the point of order is made, that it is not new matter. Then it goes in. But if he holds it is new matter, or if we hold it is new matter here in the Senate, then the report is rejected and goes back to conference. It is for us to decide whether it is new matter. I have never seen the Senate fail to reject a report where the matter was obviously new, as in this case.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to say——

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PILES. It will take me but two or three minutes to say all I have to say.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. PILES. If the Senator from Colorado can get through in a few moments, let him go ahead.

Mr. PATTERSON. It will take but very few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington yields.

Mr. PATTERSON. It amounts to precisely the same thing. As I suggested in the first instance, if it is not new matter and the Senate decides it is not, it is simply the Senate's way of saying that is the legislation the Senate wants, and it is going to have it. That has been done time and time again.

I have instances in mind—I can not name them now—but I know in the short time that I have been here there have been at least half a dozen occasions where the Senate has held against the proposition that it was new matter or new legislation, the question being submitted to the Senate by the Chair, although it was, in fact, new legislation. The Senate decided to the contrary because the Senate wanted that legislation.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PILES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. If the Senator from Maine will oblige me, I should like to know if his motion does not amount to instructions?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. PETTUS. And whether he thinks at this stage instructions ought to be given?

Mr. HALE. It is clear that we have a right to instruct, but I do not put it in quite as bald a fashion as that, because the conferees are not an obstinate and an unruly body of men; but I should like to have the expression of the Senate upon this subject of passes. So I have not put the motion in the form of instructions, but as the sense of the Senate. I could have put it in the form of an instruction——

Mr. PETTUS. My question is, Does it not amount to instructions, whether it takes that form or not?

Mr. HALE. That is for the conferees to settle.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I desire to express the hope that the conference committee will retain in this bill the amendment excepting timber and the manufactured products thereof from the provision which prohibits the carriage in interstate and foreign commerce of any article manufactured or produced by a carrier. When I had the honor to propose the amendment, I took occasion very briefly, as I shall now, to explain to the Senate my reasons for the amendment.

I regret exceedingly that the conference committee saw fit to yield to the House conferees on this point. As I understand, the reason which prompted the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to introduce the amendment prohibiting such carriage was because interstate carriers owned coal mines along their lines of road, and that those carriers were furnishing to their own coal mines cars, thereby preventing the independent coal operators from competing with them successfully in the market, because the carriers would not furnish the independent operators a sufficient number of cars, although the former had plenty of cars with which to haul the coal which they were engaged in mining. If that was the object, so far as it relates to my section of the country, it will be a detriment instead of a benefit on that point alone.

As I said the other day, Mr. President, the lumbermen of the State of Washington by means of their logging roads and steam and sailing schooners are carrying to all parts of the world the products of the forest and their sawmills, I think the greatest in the world.

These people are not engaged, strictly speaking, as common carriers, while they are such undoubtedly under the law. But there are now I suppose in the neighborhood of a thousand cars of lumber west of the Cascade Mountains, and certainly that number west of the Rocky Mountains which can not be transported over the mountains for lack of motive power. These lumbermen in my section of the country went into the business on the lines in which they are now engaged with rail and schooner for the express purpose of getting their product to market, which they could not get to market because the railroads were unable to furnish them a sufficient number of cars and sufficient motive power to take their product to market.

These people have engaged in this business, having provided their own means of transportation, by which they transport lumber from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast and to all parts of the world, which can not be transported in cars for the reasons I have stated, and which, in a large degree, has had a tendency to give a reasonable rate by which they could put their product upon the eastern market. It seems to me that Congress ought not to pass any law which would in any way prevent them from getting their product to market or to pass any law which would compel those people, through some subterfuge, to organize some company different from that which they are now operating, or to organize a number of companies for that purpose, but that they ought to be encouraged in the great business which they have undertaken.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate in discussing a question which I discussed only a few days ago. I do hope, and I felt it my duty to say it, that the Senate conferees, when they go back to reconsider the report, will stand firmly by this amendment which was inserted in the bill.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wish to ask, with the consent of the Senator from Colorado, what is the question now before the Senate. Senators seem to be discussing some other thing than the pending motion, and I wish to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the order proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. At the request of the Senator from North Dakota, it will be read again by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Maine proposes as an expression of the views of the Senate—

That passes issued by railroad corporations included in this bill be confined to actual employees of such railroads and their families.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand that the motion of the Senator from Maine is in order now.

Mr. President, the question of order that has been discussed at considerable length is a very important one for the Senate.

I do not agree with the declaration that has been made here that the question whether or not it is new matter depends entirely upon the whim of the Senate. I realize that if the Senate ever votes that it is not new matter, that is the end of the controversy. Upon ordinary subjects I admit that sometimes the Senate votes to-day that a thing is in order, to-morrow votes that it is not in order, but upon this question, which is so vital to the proper administration of affairs in the Senate, I venture to say that no man can find a precedent where, when the question has arisen as to whether it was new matter or not, and it was held by the Senate that it was, the committee has not been compelled to reconsider the matter in conference.

There is one precedent here which can be found—I found it some time ago, but I can not turn to it now—where after it was determined that the matter was new and ought not to be there the unanimous consent of the Senate was asked that it might remain, and the matter thereupon remained, and the whole subject dropped. That is the only case I found in the examination I made some time ago when the question came up whether the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes had put new matter in the report.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that where it was established clearly that the report included new matter, the chairman of the committee at once admitted it, and the bill went to a new conference by unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. That has been the custom.

Of course, in the House the Speaker determines whether it is new matter, and that ends the controversy. Here the rule has been, I think for a good many years, that the Senate determines those questions. A question of this kind a good many years ago was determined one way by the Presiding Officer, who was then Mr. Edmunds. That was as to instructions, and not as to this vital question whether the committee has put new matter in a bill. In that case it was whether there should be instructions. The Presiding Officer held, as I recollect, that there could not be instructions, and the Senate held there could be. I think it will be found that the Senate has held both ways on that subject. I think there can be instructions myself. I do not think that is a matter of very great concern, except as to when the instructions are made.

Senators will remember that not long ago, within the last two years, the House appointed conferees, and before they had had any conference with the Senate conferees the House instructed their conferees what to do and what not to do; whereupon the Senate refused to confer with the House conferees until they receded from that position.

I regard the question whether there shall be new matter put into a bill by the agency of a conference committee as the most important one which can be raised here in reference to the orderly proceeding of this body. In the great majority of cases we accept a conference report nem. con. We pay little attention to it. We believe the committee have done the best they could. Where they have taken what was in the House bill and what was put in by the Senate, and arranged them in any way consistent with the fact that both had been passed upon by the Senate, we have accepted them.

I dare say that in the whole history of the Senate—it ought to be said of every legislative body, and I believe it is true of the Parliament of Great Britain—there never has been a case where the conferees have put in new legislation, and it was apparent that it was new legislation, and it was admitted to be new legislation, that the House has accepted it as a part of the transaction.

There are a great many cases that come before us where it is difficult to determine whether or not it is new legislation. I am disposed myself to believe that the provision in this bill concerning passes goes beyond the power of the conference committee, but Senators in whose judgment I have great confidence tell me I am wrong, and very likely I am, although upon a question of that kind the Senate might divide. The Senate might determine that I was wrong, and that would be the end of the controversy.

But we have in this report several things that the conference committee say they knew were new, but they thought it would improve the bill if they put them in. That is not the province of a conference committee, speaking with all due respect for the committee. They are not empowered to do that. They are simply to determine what was the mind of the Senate on one proposition and what was the mind of the House on the same proposition, and, if possible, to reconcile the differences between the two. That they can do. But when they come to say, "We thought it would be a good thing to put in this provision, and therefore we have put it in, although neither body had ever considered it," such a proceeding would lead to interminable confusion, and it would be the duty of every Senator—he would be compelled to watch with the greatest care—to see that these things were not done. We have a right to suppose when a conference committee go out that they will confine themselves to the custom that has been in vogue in this country and in England, that new matter shall not be put in.

I speak with some feeling on this subject, because we have been condemning this practice for some time. I have myself been on a good many conference committees where there has been an attempt to change the text of a bill and to put in some new matter, and I will say for myself that I have never consented to that, and I do not recall now that I was ever a party to a conference committee that did agree to it. I know the members of the Appropriations Committee have stood inflexibly against the slightest change that was not justified by the rule.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I want to bear testimony to what the Senator is just saying. There is no committee in this body that deals with so many subjects affected by legislation as does the Committee on Appropriations, of which the Senator from Colorado is an old, experienced, and most valuable member. The practice of that committee is to report the result of a conference to the Senate. It mentions amendments by number. It declares what amendments have been added. In twenty years I have hardly ever known, or ever known, a question to arise as to whether new legislation was embodied in those reports. The reason is that the Committee on Appropriations sets its face sternly against all new matter. As an old member of that committee, I would hold myself delinquent if I ever consented, in the numerous matters that come before that committee, to anything that involves new matter. I would consider myself, as the Senator from Colorado would consider himself, delinquent in my duty to this body if I did so.

I hope the rule of that committee will be maintained not only in that committee, but in reports from all other conference committees. This discussion, Mr. President, is not without its great uses.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the senior Senator from Colorado yield to the junior Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator from Maine say that there is no case in which a point of order against matters contained in appropriation bills coming from the Committee on Appropriations has been sustained?

Mr. HALE. No; I do not.

Mr. PATTERSON. I recall quite a number.

Mr. HALE. I say I have never known an instance, in connection with that committee, where the conferees have deliberately put in new matter, and I hope I shall never know of such an instance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two about the question that has been disturbing the Senate for a day or two, and that is with respect to passes. We put in a very elaborate provision as to passes, somewhat remarkable and quite wonderful. The conference committee strike all of that out and insert something that I think was neither in the House bill in principle nor in the bill as it passed the Senate. There was nothing in the House bill about passes.

In my judgment, if we had confined the interdiction of passes to members of both Houses, the judiciary of the country, and the executive officers of the country, it would have been as far as it was necessary for us to go with reference to the matter. We then should have, perhaps, provided that a railroad company should not make a discrimination between shippers and give a pass to one shipper and deny it to another. I believe they might give it to one class of shippers, like the cattle shippers, while they might decline to give a pass to the man who ships the common products that need no care or attention en route.

I think the committee ought to go back and take up a part, at least, of the Senate amendment, if they do not want to put in all of the Senate amendment, and I should hope they will not, because some part of it I think should be left out. I wish they would go into that to a sufficient extent so as to permit railroad employees and their families and railroad attorneys to have passes. The public do not complain of that. They have complained of Representatives and Senators taking passes, on the theory that they would be influenced in favor of the railroads because they carried them free. I do not believe there is anything in that at all. I do not believe any man who ever got into the Senate was small enough and mean enough to fail to do his duty here because some railroad company gave him a pass on its road.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wanted to inquire whether the Senator from Colorado is sufficiently familiar with the present law, the law of 1887 as amended in 1895, to justify him in passing judgment as to whether it is sufficient.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite familiar with that law. I helped to pass the law of 1887, and I helped to pass the law of 1895.

Mr. CULLOM. I know the Senator did, but I did not know whether he remembered it sufficiently.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I remember very well the provision about passes. While I know it has not always been adhered to by the railway companies, I believe that act excluded passes, and I believe it now excludes passes. I do not think a Member of Congress ought to accept free transportation, not because I think he will change his views on the subject of railroad legislation, but simply because of the speech of the people; because I think that is a deference we ought to show to the people. For that reason I would confine, if I could, the interdiction of passes to the three classes I have mentioned, and to shippers.

I have before me a large number of these telegrams, which every Senator has received. I did not think it worth while to send them to the desk. I have them on my desk. I sympathize fully with these people. I do not think any harm will come from permitting the railroads to issue passes to their employees, and I know the railroad people want to give them that privilege. I have here, which I will ask to have read, a telegram from Mr. Ripley, who is the president of the Atchison and Santa Fe, a practical railroad man. I think it explains the situation. I hope the committee, before they get through with their proceedings, will put something of the kind in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hon. HENRY M. TELLER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

While in full sympathy with prohibition of free passes in general, the bill as amended in conference imposes great hardship on lower grades of employees and will create much trouble; also, we must move large numbers of laborers over long distances. They have no money nor would it be safe to furnish them with amount necessary to pay fare. Provision should certainly be made for free transportation for our own officers and men and members of their families, otherwise great burden imposed on us without benefit to anyone.

E. P. RIPLEY.

Mr. TELLER. I have been told that a similar telegram has been read. I did not know that fact. It escaped my attention.

Mr. CULLOM. It has been.

Mr. TELLER. That is from a practical railroad man, and I think it ought to have some weight with the committee. That is all I care to say upon this question.

Mr. HALE. It is in no way a dispatch that is dictated by selfishness on the part of Mr. Ripley, but it recognizes the importance in their business of favoring their employees by giving them this transportation, which I think everybody is in favor of.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that every railroad company ever since there have been railroad companies organized in this country has issued passes to its employees. They are in the habit of doing it. Some years ago, before I came to the Senate, I was president of a railroad company. I had something to do with the construction and the operation of a road for six or eight years. I know something about the practical needs of a railroad company in these matters. It would be almost impossible to do business properly if every railroad employee had to get a ticket. It is absurd to think about it, and we have no right to demand anything of that kind from a railroad company, in my opinion. They have a right to do their business, if they do it so that the public are not distressed and injured by it, as it suits them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a change made by the conferees which it was entirely within their province to make and agree to, but which seems to me to be of the most serious character.

In the penal clauses, which I offered as an amendment, and also in the one offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the words "knowingly and willfully" appear. They were, on my motion, inserted in the clauses which I moved as an amendment, subsequent to the adoption of the clauses, and were adopted by the Senate by a large majority on a record vote. With those words out there is not a railroad officer in the United States who is not liable to be put in prison or heavily fined at any moment through the error of some clerk or perhaps the misdoing of some clerk or the inadvertence of some subordinate in giving a lower rate than the published rate. It seems to me——

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying. I am trying to find the line in the bill to which the conference report refers. I note on page 3——

Mr. LODGE. Page 16, lines 23 and 24; page 18, line 20; page 19, line 9.

Mr. DANIEL. I note in the conferees' report on page 3, that it is referred to as in line 35.

Mr. LODGE. That must be a mistake.

Mr. DANIEL. If we were to adopt that report——

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. "In line 35," it says, "strike out 'knowingly and willfully.'"

Mr. LODGE. That follows the lines of the amendment separately, I think.

Mr. TILLMAN. It follows the lines of the blue print.

Mr. LODGE. The blue print.

Mr. TILLMAN. The old bill, as it comes from the House.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct, but I have to make my reference to the printed bill we have here.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, for which I voted and which I think was an excellent amendment, provided that in the case of a shipper soliciting or receiving a rebate or discrimination, he should be liable in a civil action for three times the amount. The words "knowingly and willfully" are stricken out of that clause, and a shipper who may have paid what he believed to be the proper published rate, owing to a mistake or inadvertence of the shipping clerk, finds himself liable to damages in three times the amount, although he knew, and could know, nothing about it and was perfectly innocent in regard to it.

It seems to me that such a departure from the ordinary penal statutes of the United States and of every State of the Union ought not to be made. It does not seem to me that it is right to put this great body of men engaged in business all over the country at the mercy of anyone who for revenge perhaps, or for purposes of blackmail would take advantage of a law like this subjecting the shipper to imprisonment and fine.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. How can you prove that a corporation does a thing knowingly and willfully?

Mr. LODGE. It covers not only corporations. It covers specifically natural persons. It covers every officer, every agent, every shipper, every one of whom could do it knowingly and willfully.

Mr. MCCUMBER. May I call the Senator's attention to one paragraph on page 17, which declares positively that—

In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier, or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper as well as that of the person.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; and the Senator from North Dakota has read the words to show the natural persons. Moreover, you can not put corporations in prison; and, of course, the only ones I am trying to protect are the individuals, the agents and officers of the road. It seems to me to make any class of men anywhere subject to a penal statute of this kind, where they may find themselves in jail and under heavy fines for an offense of which they were absolutely guiltless, is very poor legislation.

I do not desire to press this to a vote of instruction, if the conferees will consent to the removal of these lines without bringing it back again to the Senate. But if they desire it, I shall be very glad to take the sense of the Senate on the striking out of those vital words. It is quite within the power of the Senate to instruct conferees. I send to the desk, and ask that there may be printed in the RECORD two instances which I have marked, where in previous conferences, once on the motion of Senator Sherman, the conferees were instructed; and later, if it seems desirable, I will offer a resolution of instruction.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. Clark, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, reported that the committee having met, after full and free conference had been unable to agree.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 649) last mentioned, with the amendments thereto in disagreement between the two Houses; and,

On motion by Mr. Nesmith to recommit the bill, with the amendments thereto in disagreement between the two Houses, to the committee of conference, with instructions to agree to an amendment in the following words:

"And the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House."

On motion by Mr. Buckalew to amend the motion of Mr. Nesmith, by striking out the part making an appropriation of $43,000, and in lieu thereof inserting, "That the committee be authorized to agree to a provision for the payment of 20 per cent additional compensation to the officers of both Houses for the present session,

It was determined in the negative.

On the question to agree to the motion of Mr. Nesmith,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 18.

On motion by Mr. Trumbull,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs, Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wright.

Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilson.

So it was—

Resolved, That the bill, with the amendments thereto in disagreement between the two Houses, be recommitted to the committee of conference, with instructions to agree upon an amendment in the following words: "And the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House."

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

[Senate Journal, March 1, 1865, pp. 268, 269.]

Mr. Sherman submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 207, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, except so much of said amendments as relates to imported cotton.

On motion by Mr. Morton, to amend the resolution by striking out the words "except so much of said amendments as relates to imported cotton" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and agree to a proposition to suspend the entire tax on cotton during the year 1868, and that the tax on cotton thereafter shall be 1 cent per pound,"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 23.

On motion by Mr. Morton,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade.

Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson.

So the amendment was not agreed to; and

On the question to agree to the resolution, as submitted by Mr. Sherman,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 18.

[Senate Journal, January 22, 1868, pp. 119 and 120.]

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I desire to take the time of the Senate for only five minutes upon the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. I always thought that the words "or willfully" ought never to have gone into this law. I think it is a great mistake to leave the word "willfully" in there. I am not so confident——

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator object to the word "knowingly" too?

Mr. RAYNER. I was going to say I am not quite so confident about the word "knowingly." The word "knowingly" has a very ambiguous construction, but there is no ambiguity about the word "willfully" at all. I do not think you will ever be able to convict anybody under this statute if you require proof of willfullness.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me a moment, the instruction which I shall move later, if necessary, is that the Senate conferees on House bill 12987 be instructed to insist upon the retention of the word "knowingly."

All I have asked is to retain the word "knowingly."

Mr. RAYNER. I am not quite so certain about the word "knowingly." The words "knowingly and willfully" sometimes have the same construction. Let me give just a few examples of the word "willfully." I think it must be done knowingly. The carrier could not possibly give a rebate and the shipper could not receive a rebate without its being done knowingly. The very act itself implies that there is consciousness.

Mr. LODGE. There is a great deal more than a rebate. There is a discrimination, a departure from the published rate, which a clerk might make by mistake.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me suggest to the Senator a few authorities on the word "willfully."

"Willfully" is defined by Webster to mean "in a willful manner; obstinately; stubbornly; by design; with set purpose." (Whitman v. State, 22 N. W., 459, 460; 17 Nebr., 224; Huff v. Chicago, I. & L. Rwy. Co, 56 N. E., 932, 934; 24 Ind. App., 492; 79 Am. St. Rep., 274; Miller v. Miller, 47 N. E., 338, 339; 17 Ind. App., 605; Dull v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Rwy. Co., 52 N. E., 1013; 21 Ind. App., 571; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Nash., 27 N. E., 564, 565; 1 Ind. App., 298.)

* * * * * * *

The word "willfully" means not merely voluntarily, but with a bad purpose. (Potter v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct., 144, 147; 155 U. S., 438; 39 L. Ed., 214; Commonwealth v. Kneeland, 37 Mass., 20 Pick., 206; Williams v. People, 57 Pac., 701, 702; 26 Colo., 272.)

Bad motive is not necessary to make an act willful, and the fact that the act of omission is done in obedience to the will is not enough. (State v. Alcorn, 14 S. W., 663, 664; 78 Tex., 387.)

The word "willfully" as used in act of Congress of July 12, 1882, section 13, imposing a penalty upon one who shall willfully violate, as well as upon one who shall resort to any device to evade, the provisions of the act, means not merely voluntarily, but with a bad purpose. (Spurr v. United States, 19 Sup. Ct., 812, 815; 174 U. S., 728; 43 L. Ed., 1150).

The word "willful" as used in a statute providing that the act of cutting trees must be willful to authorize punishment therefor means intentionally, malevolently, with a bad purpose, an evil purpose, without ground for believing the act to be lawful. (Hateley v. State, 44 S. E., 853; 118 Ga., 79 (citing King v. State, 103 Ga., 265; 30 S. E., 30).)

The word "willfully," when used in a statute creating a criminal offense, means not merely voluntarily, but with a bad purpose. (State of North Carolina v. Vanderford (U. S.), 35 Fed., 282, 287.)

"Willfully," in the ordinary sense in which it is used in the statutes, means not merely voluntarily, but with a bad purpose. A "willful act," in the usual sense of the words, is one done designedly, intentionally, or purposely; and also "willful misconduct" means misconduct to which the will is a party. Hence it is held that, in an action against a railroad for killing stock an allegation in the complaint that the killing was willfully done is sufficient to show an intentional killing. (Chicago, St. L. and P. R. R. Co. v. Nash, 1 Ind. App., 298, 300; 27 N. E., 564.)

One Mills' Ann. St., § 2170 (Gen. St. 1883, § 787) defines perjury as testifying willfully, corruptly, and falsely. "Willfully" is a word of stronger meaning than either "corruptly" or "falsely." "Willfully," as employed in criminal and penal statutes, usually means something more than intentionally and voluntarily. It implies that the act done which it characterizes is designedly done, with some bad purpose or without justifiable excuse. (Williams v. People, 57 Pac., 701, 702; 26 Colo., 272.)

And so on.

There is a whole line of cases. I do not pass upon the word "knowingly," because there are a number of cases here that hold that "knowingly" is the same as "willfully," but I think it would be utterly impossible to obtain a conviction if you leave the word "willfully" in the statute.

Mr. BAILEY and Mr. FULTON addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I know what the Senator from Oregon is going to speak about, and in attempting to answer the Senator from the State of Washington I anticipate the Senator from the State of Oregon. They both complain because upon the insistence of the House conferees the Senate conferees agreed to eliminate the exception in favor of timber and its products in what is known as the coal amendment, No. 5.

Mr. President, I can not myself conceive of any commodity which was less entitled to the benefit of this exception than lumber. Coal, so far as the known quantity is concerned, in spite of its vast consumption, is not seriously diminishing in quantity. New discoveries are bringing to the use of the world great coal fields every twelve months, until the amount of coal now in sight is greater than ever before in the history of the Republic. The same is true in some measure of iron, of copper, and of other metals, and their related products.

But the timber supply of this country is rapidly disappearing, until to-day the price of lumber presents a serious question to every man who comes to build his home. If there is any reason and any justice in forbidding the carrier to engage in interstate commerce when it likewise engages in the monopolization of coal and iron land, that reason applies with equal or with greater force to the timber lands of the United States.

We are not in the midst of a timber famine, but we have reached a point where the woods are thin, and we are almost in sight of the day when the price of timber will be double what it is to-day. In the great Northwest within thirty years they have seen the stumpage rise from two dollars a thousand to eight, nine, and ten dollars a thousand. In the great Southwest we have seen the yellow-pine timber there, because of its diminishing quantity, increase in price from a dollar and two dollars an acre, until to-day it commands twenty-five and thirty dollars, and in some cases $40 and $50, where it is especially convenient to transportation lines.

Now, for this Congress, after putting its prohibition upon the ownership of coal and iron and zinc and lead and copper mines, to invite the railroads of the country to acquire the remaining timber lands is to commit, in my judgment, a grave crime against the next generation of American citizens. This law will not be as old as the law which it amends until the price of timber in this country will be well-nigh double what it is to-day, and no man ventures to believe that such a circumstance is likely to occur with respect to the price of coal, or iron, or lead, or zinc, or copper.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that if there is one commodity whose monopolization by the railroads of this country ought to be discouraged, it is the one which we can stand and see disappearing before our very eyes.

But, Mr. President, I hardly think it worth the while of the Senate to argue that. I assume that exception will be eliminated.

Before I resume my seat I want to complain because of another elimination from this bill, and in making this complaint I intend no criticism of the Senate conferees, because I declare my belief that they have faithfully and well sustained the action of the Senate. It was to be expected that they would yield something to the judgment of the House, and surely they have been compelled to yield as little as any of us could have hoped. But I sincerely regret, Mr. President, that the conferees of the House should have chosen, as one of their demands, to eliminate sleeping-car companies from the provisions of this bill. They leave in the express companies and they take out the sleeping-car company, and yet, Mr. President, I declare in the presence of this Senate and this country that the sleeping-car company of the United States is the only absolute and complete monopoly in this Republic. The railroads suffer some competition at each other's hands.

There are several express companies competing with each other for the price and privilege of carrying packages. The Pullman Car Company alone is free from all competition. There was a competing company a few years ago, but, with the rapacity that characterizes this particular corporation, it bought out its competitor and consolidated the two companies.

Mr McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if it is not true that several of the transcontinental lines run their own sleepers and Pullman cars? I think that is true of the Great Northern and that it is true of some of the others.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it for granted, Mr. President, that that is true in two or three instances; possibly more. But that does not militate against the statement which I have just made. Not only did the Pullman Car Company absorb its rival and competing company, but three or four years before it accomplished that absorption it watered its own stock to the extent of $18,000,000, increasing it from $36,000,000 to $54,000,000, and then added another $20,000,000 when it purchased the competing Wagner Company. What was the price it paid for its competitor's property I do not know, but this I do know, that the Pullman Car Company is one enterprise in this country whose charges to-day are in many respects and over many routes of travel higher than they were twenty years ago.

Twenty years ago when a citizen of our own State came to travel from Fort Worth, Tex., to the city of St. Louis the trip occupied thirty-six hours—two days and one night. The price was $1 per day for a seat and $2 a night for the bed, the thirty-six hours aggregating $4. Now the distance is traveled in twenty-two hours, and the Pullman Car Company charges $5 for its accommodation.

Remember, too, Mr. President, that the railroads pay the Pullman Company for the privilege of hauling its cars by the mile, and the 750 miles from Fort Worth to St. Louis, which formerly occupied thirty-six hours, are now traversed in twenty-two hours. Thus from the railroad the Pullman Car Company receives as much for the use of its car twenty-two hours as it formerly received in thirty-six hours, and from the passenger it receives more for the accommodation covering twenty-two hours than it formerly received for the accommodation covering thirty-six hours.

Even to-day I take the train at Fort Worth on my way to St. Louis, and I am compelled to pay $5. If I go into the open coach of the common carrier and wait until I reach Fort Scott, in Kansas, I pay $2 from there to St. Louis. The distance from Fort Worth to Fort Scott is traveled in about eleven hours, while the distance from Fort Scott to St. Louis is traveled in about eleven hours; and yet they charge $3 from Fort Worth to Fort Scott through the daytime and charge only $2 for the night, including the bed, from Fort Scott to the city of St. Louis, requiring an equal time for the travel.

I could instance many other iniquitous injustices like this, but they are as familiar to all Senators who use this convenience as they are to me.

Mr. President, why should this corporation be exempted from the law which is to govern other common carriers? Are they less prosperous? Their earnings, according to their own reports, exceeded, in 1904, $24,000,000. Their fixed charges, including their dividends, amounted to only about $17,000,000 after paying a dividend of 8 per cent—a dividend which every great common carrier in this country would gladly accept as a return upon its capitalization. Indeed, the other common carriers would be glad to get an assurance of 8 per cent upon their fair and honest value. Yet this corporation, after paying an 8 per cent dividend upon its entire capital stock, much of which represents no actual investment, carried over $5,000,000 to its surplus fund—$5,000,000 as I see stated in one report, and more than $3,000,000 as I see stated in another.

Mr. President, it will not do to say that but few people use the sleeping-car accommodations. The reports show that they carried over 12,000,000 passengers last year. And it is not true that the rich and prosperous alone contribute to swell their revenue. Many of those who are none too well to do, when upon errands of sickness or mercy or duty, are compelled to use them for their comfort; and there can be no justification to allow this absolute and complete monopoly the only exemption accorded to any common carrier by rail under this law.

Sir, we talk of trusts and monopolies. None of them have yet been able to make themselves an undisputed master in their field of enterprise. The great Standard Oil trust is in many sections subjected to the competition of independent refiners and producers. The great beef trust in almost every town and village in the land must encounter the competition of the local butcher. The sugar trust has not yet perfected its monopoly, nor has the tobacco trust. The great steel trust, the greatest in its capital and in its extent ever organized since the foundation of this Republic, must meet its weaker competitors in the open markets of the world and sell its wares in competition with them.

Look over the entire field. There is no absolute and complete monopoly under this flag except only the Pullman Palace Car Company, and yet the conferees of the House—fair-minded and honorable men—for some inscrutable reason demand that while we are regulating carriers which meet competition there shall be no regulation of this single carrier without competition.

Mr. President, the country will be disappointed, and the country will have a right to be disappointed, if when the Senate disagrees to this conference report the conferees of the House still insist upon this exemption of the Pullman Palace Car Company.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise simply for the purpose of stating that I think the conferees have acted wisely and done well in striking out the words "knowingly and willfully." If those words are inserted practically those paragraphs of the bill are of no value, for in every case the offending carrier will seek immunity under the guise that he did not do it knowingly or willfully. He will claim that it was done by some subordinate, some man who had no business to do it, and in that way seek to escape the force of those provisions of the statute.

In respect to the corporation itself, if those words are retained you never can convict a corporation of violating the statute, because there is no such thing as proving that the corporation did it knowingly and willfully. It is a soulless, bloodless being, and you can not furnish any proof that that soulless, bloodless identity did it knowingly and willfully.

So in respect to the higher officers, the presidents and the general managers, they would seek immunity under it, because they would say that some clerk, some man working for $1,000 or $1,200 a year did it, and, "bless your soul, we did not know a thing about it. This thing escaped our attention." If you leave those words in the bill I do not believe you can convict a single carrier of any violation of those provisions of the statute. I therefore trust that the Senate will adhere to the action of the conferees, who have acted wisely in this matter, and stand by the conferees on that point.

I desire to speak on another subject for just a moment. A good deal has been said in reference to the pass amendment. I will not take up the time of the Senate to go into any details, but it seems to me that the proper solution of that matter is to adhere to the law of 1895. That law has been in force for ten years, and, so far as I know, there has been no complaint against it of any serious character from anybody. The people of the country have become accustomed to the provisions of that law. The only thing I could suggest in connection with it would be an amendment incorporating the addition of a penal clause to it.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I find this language at the bottom of page 16 of the bill:

Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall, knowingly and willfully—

"Knowingly and willfully" being erased—offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000.

Now, I ask this question: Suppose the Senator or any other shipper were to ask for a rate, and it be given to him, and he received or accepted it and paid his money, and suppose it were to turn out that he and others received in such rate what in fact was a discrimination against other classes or persons, would he not be guilty under this act, if "knowingly" were left out, and would he not be fined and punished for misdemeanor when he had no means of knowing and did not in fact know that he was violating the law?

Mr. NELSON. In that case he would be doing it, and not an employee——

Mr. DANIEL. I have not quite finished.

In the case of the corporation, it is true they have no flesh and blood; but the shipper has flesh and blood, and the shipper may or may not have a purse, and where a person had, with entire innocence accepted or received a rate in fact discriminatory, but not so known to him, if he were punished, would it not be wrong?

Mr. NELSON. I think so.

Mr. DANIEL. Then if you strike out——

Mr. NELSON. We have an illustration of how it works in a recent case.

Mr. DANIEL. If you strike out the word "knowingly," the shipper would be punished, would he not?

Mr. NELSON. Not necessarily.

Mr. DANIEL. Why not?

Mr. NELSON. He would not be punished if he did not do it, if it was done by an employee or by a subordinate.

Mr. DANIEL. But suppose the man received it, and received it unknowingly, would he not be punished under the terms of the act if you leave "knowingly" out?

Mr. NELSON. How would you reach such cases as we have had lately investigated in the Southwest?

Mr. DANIEL. I am not talking about those cases.

Mr. NELSON. In those cases the shippers received money in packages by mail or express without any indication from whom it came or for what it was given. The carrier would in some secret way send the rebate money to the shipper in an envelope or in an express package, without letting him know from what source it came. In such cases of rebate the shipper can come in and say, "Bless your soul, I do not know from where this money came."

Mr. DANIEL. But that is not what we are discussing now.

Mr. NELSON. The shipper says: "I did not receive this money intentionally; it came to me like manna from heaven; and I accepted it."

The terms "knowingly" and "willfully" in this connection mean in law a criminal intent; and you would have to prove in every instance what amounts in law to a criminal intent in case of the violation of the provisions of this law; and if you retain those words in the law, in my opinion, it will be utterly impossible to secure a single conviction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if this pass amendment was ridiculous in the form in which it was adopted by the Senate, it seems to me that it is even more ridiculous and certainly more unjust in the form in which it has passed the scrutiny of the committee of conference.

The Senate has put itself upon record, Mr. President, as being against the free pass generally. It has also put itself on record that it does not intend to demand the entire elimination of free transportation to the extent of doing injustice to the employees of the companies or an injustice to those persons who, under every dictate of conscience and humanity, would naturally be granted free transportation. We expressed those two ideas clearly and definitely when the matter was before the Senate. Now, why should we go further than that, and attempt to do such a ridiculous thing and such an injustice as is attempted and insisted upon by the conferees of the House of Representatives?

Mr. President, what offense is it against the public when a great section of the country, which does not demand laborers during a certain season of the year, and where laborers are not naturally located during a certain season of the year, suddenly for one month or six weeks requires a great amount of labor, and the railways furnish reduced transportation in order to bring the laborer from where he is out of employment and out of means—it may be a thousand or 1,500 miles away—and place him where there is a demand for his services, to the benefit not only of the railroad, which is to look after the output of the crop, or whatever else is to be secured by his labor, but of the community as well? We need in the western country at certain seasons of the year a great number of laborers. They are not located there during the winter, but they are in the great cities; they are in the lumber camps; they are not upon the plains; but at certain seasons of the year we do need them, and they have hitherto been granted either free transportation or else transportation at greatly reduced rates. Is the public complaining about that? Has the Senator from South Carolina heard any complaint upon that proposition? If there is no complaint, if it is for the benefit of the country, why should that right be denied to the railway companies and also to the great sections of the country that are to be benefited by it?

If you pass this law just as it comes from the committee of conference, in the case of a great railroad wreck, when men are maimed and injured, it may be their legs or arms cut off, you deny the right of the company to take a maimed passenger, whose legs or arms have been cut off, or who has been otherwise injured by reason of a collision or getting under the wheels of the train, to his destination, if that destination be on its own line, or off the line on which he has bought a ticket, unless he has got money to pay his fare—if the company does that the fine is from $1,000 to $20,000; and if there should happen to be a hundred persons, that would be a hundred thousand dollars in a single day, or twenty hundred thousand dollars in the matter of fines against the railway company. I do not believe in enacting a law which the dictates of humanity and common sense would revolt at and say that it should not be enforced.

We had a great calamity at San Francisco a very short time ago. For days and weeks the railroads were compelled to take out the homeless people from that city and to give free transportation. Had this law been in force, and had it been enforced as well as being in force, there could not a single railway company have stood up against the fines that would have been imposed upon it. Are the people demanding that we should enact such ridiculous laws?

Let me give you another illustration. There were recently immense fires in San Francisco, as there were immense fires in Baltimore a few years ago, and there have been other great fires, and, as has already been suggested, the railway companies take any person who is willing to go where such fires are in progress and assist in putting out the flames; and yet if the railway companies should do that under the law as it is proposed by the committee of conference, they would be guilty of a great offense and would be heavily fined. Is there any demand for any such a law as that?

Let me give you still another case, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, I will allow the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already said twice, and I will now say for the third time, if the Senator will pardon me—perhaps he did not hear me—that the conferees brought in this report in order to secure an agreement. It was this or nothing. But we knew from the terms of it that it could not go into effect until January next, and we never expected for a moment that either the Senate or the House would stand by it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That certainly shows the good judgment of the Senator. Neither House ought to stand by it, and I am simply trying by my voice to support the Senate conferees when they go into conference the next time.

Let me give you another illustration. There are, perhaps, to-day out in the mountains of Colorado, in New Mexico, in Arizona, in Nevada, and in California close on to 100,000 people who have gone there for their health. I can safely say, from the best information I can get, that there are tens of thousands of persons afflicted with tuberculosis who have gone there to regain their health simply because some of their friends induced the railroad companies to give them free transportation. Otherwise, they would have been unable to go there, and half of them would have been in their graves to-day had not that kindness and courtesy been granted by the railroad companies. Is there any complaint on the part of the public because this is being done? It seems to me that if the public understood and fully comprehended the good being done and the lives being saved by those little acts of courtesy it would rise and would demand of us that we allow the railroad companies to engage to that extent in granting free transportation.

There are many children, cripples from infancy, who are sent to institutions in some of our great cities for the very purpose of being attended to, and it is necessary in most cases that they secure free transportation. We have societies that are looking after the interests of such people all the while. Would you deny them the right of having free transportation for these little sufferers? It seems to me that we are going wild upon this matter of the restriction of free transportation.

Again, concerning live stock. Has there been any demand, let me ask any Senator here, that transportation should not be given to the owners of stock, or their employees, who are to accompany and look after the cattle? If there has been no complaint and if that privilege has not been abused, what occasion is there to prohibit the granting of free transportation to those persons?

I want to say a word about the word "knowingly," which has been stricken out. Let me call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to this provision. I especially invite his attention, because the Senator from South Carolina has charge of this bill. I note that at the bottom of page 17 we have enunciated a rule for the construction and enforcement of these provisions. What is that rule?

> In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier, or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper as well as that of the person.

Now, note that under the bill as it stands, with the words "willfully" and "knowingly" stricken out, if an agent at some way station should make a mistake and should charge either too much or too little every day for a month, through an error, thinking that he had the rate between two places right, when in fact he was in error, he could be brought up and fined a thousand dollars a day for each day that this error was being committed.

That is bad enough; that is hard enough, I think the Senator and the Senate will agree; but when you go further than that and say that the corporation itself, which had no knowledge whatever of this error—and over a mighty line of railroad it is probable that a hundred such errors of no more importance might be made in a week—should be fined, without any knowledge whatever of the fact that the employee had made a mistake, to the extent of from one to twenty thousand dollars for every error, it is going very far. If that be true, and it certainly is true, under the provisions of this bill ought we not at least to retain in that sentence the word "knowingly?" It seems to me that word should be in all laws of this kind. I am speaking now of the criminal, not of the civil action.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me ask the Senator a question. It is impossible from the criminal standpoint for anybody to do any of these things without knowing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The local agent may have known it, and he would be fined. The next officer above him might not have known it, and the corporation through its agencies generally would have no knowledge of it. Would it be just, would it be fair to fine that company $20,000 for a mere mistake that might not have involved more than a single dollar and that was made without its knowledge?

Mr. TILLMAN. What are the things, however, that are to be knowingly and willfully done? To "grant, give, solicit, accept, or receive any rebate." We are trying, or we are pretending to try, to stop this pernicious practice of discrimination by granting rebates. The words "knowingly and willfully," if left in the bill, would make it practically impossible to convict. I do hope the Senate will not consent to tie the hands of the conferees by any attempt at instruction; but if, when we get through in conference and bring the report back after calmly considering all the arguments that have been made here and the enlightenment which has been offered us—if we bring in a report to the Senate that the Senate does not like, the Senate can reject it and then instruct.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator has not read even all the provision to which he refers. It is as follows:

> Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000.

Each day that this error or mistake, innocently made by a single one of the employees, is continued constitutes a new offense, and a one thousand or a twenty thousand dollar fine will follow.

The Senator must necessarily see that, in addition to rebates, in addition to a mere error in estimating what the cost of transporting a carload of cattle or a carload of goods from one point to another will be—in addition to that, I say, sometimes the agent must determine what the law does not determine, and if he makes a mistake he comes under the ban of the provisions of this act.

Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble, Mr. President, is that the Senator is very solicitous to take care of the exceptions—the incident or accident of somebody once in a thousand times doing this thing innocently. In taking care of that exception, however, he would leave a loophole in the other 999 times for the scoundrel to keep out of the penitentiary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think, Mr. President, that there would be any loophole in it whatever. If the agent knowingly and willfully takes more or takes less than what is due, he is punished. If he takes it, in nine cases out of ten it will be known that he took it willfully and knowingly. If he makes an error in the case, and makes it in favor of one person and does not make the error in favor of another person, it is rather conclusive evidence that it was not an error at all.

But I was going to call the Senator's attention to another provision, and that is discrimination as between localities. That is made an offense, and yet the discrimination must be one which is a reasonable discrimination. I do not know just what the words are, because I have not the particular section before me, but there is allowed a certain discrimination as between certain localities, and the agent is compelled often to determine whether that discrimination is a just discrimination. Does the Senator understand me on that? The agent must determine whether it is a just discrimination; and if the court determine, or a jury determine, that it was unjust, then, of course, he must stand the penalty that is prescribed by the law. If he must determine that, then should we not at least throw around him the protection that it should be done knowingly and willfully, and not be a mere mistake as to what is a just discrimination and what is not a just discrimination?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, does not the Senator see that in a case where it was self-evident that there had been a mistake made, and it was nothing but a mistake, while the man might be guilty technically, the judge would be compelled to notify the jury that the man had committed no crime, because there was no intent to commit a crime, and, therefore, there would be no conviction?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken. Under this proposed law the judge will give no such instruction. He could not give this instruction under this proposed law, if you give any effect whatever to the law which makes one person responsible for the act of another. Here we have a civil action by which a person is fined three times the amount that has been received. If that fine is imposed, it seems to me proper at least that "knowingly" should be retained. It is not so important as it would be in a case entirely criminal in its nature and not quasi criminal. But I want to call attention——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the act is not only declared a misdemeanor, and there is a forfeiture of three times the amount received because of the commission of the offense, but in the same section it is provided:

> That any person, or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act, or the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall, in addition to the fine herein provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Therefore it follows, I submit to the Senator, that under this section as amended, striking out the words "knowingly and willfully," we would have the curious spectacle of a person being sent to the penitentiary for not to exceed two years for an act of which he had no knowledge and which was not willfully done. It seems to me that this is equivalent to branding with the ordinary brand of felony, under the misnomer of a misdemeanor, without any criminal intent being required by the statute at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. When we want an effective measure we can get it effective by making the fines and penalties strong and sufficient. We can destroy its effectiveness by making it so unjust that a jury will never convict. In passing any criminal law we ought to keep both of these matters carefully in mind. You can not get a jury to convict, even though the evidence be clear, where the punishment is out of all proportion to the crime, or where the person is to be convicted for merely making an error. You merely weaken the law.

Before I resume my seat I wish to call attention to one other provision. I do not know how strenuous the efforts of the House conferees were in attempting to retain upon this bill the salary of $10,000 for the members of the Commission and five or six thousand dollars for a clerk and $4,000 for an assistant clerk. But I do wish to submit to every Senator who has an idea of justice on the matter of fixing salaries the inconsistency of this bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts first proposed to raise the salary because he desired the very best men that could be secured for the personnel of that Commission, and yet we are compelled in this instance to pay $10,000 to a Commissioner and then provide for an appeal by this Commissioner to a $6,000-judge. It does seem to me that the judge, who is to pass upon the intelligence and the acumen of the Commissioner, ought to have as great intelligence as the Commissioner, and if he is to revise and to correct his errors, then what objection is there to saying that, in order to get a good judge, we have got to pay him $15,000?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. It is equivalent to fixing the salaries of the heads of divisions in the Departments at a greater sum than is given to the members of the President's Cabinet, who must review and consider all the acts of their employees. I for one, and I believe there will be others here, will insist that the salaries of the Commissioners are now sufficient as long as we pay judges $6,000, as long as Senators, who receive only $5,000, are compelled to stay by that salary; so long as the clerks of our committees receive twenty-two hundred dollars; and no one will deny that you need a better man for clerk of one of these great committees, because he must be an all-around man, with knowledge on every subject that may come up before him, than you need in one who is to keep the records in a special class of cases.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from South Carolina, who certainly understands and comprehends the injustice and the inconsistency of this, will insist upon the Senate amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not feel as if I had much right to criticise any part of this measure or the action of the committee of conference, because I stood amongst a very small minority—myself and two other Senators—in voting against the entire bill. I found in the bill many difficulties, some of them of a very grave constitutional character, in my judgment, which compelled me to vote against it. I would not now take the floor upon this bill except to try to explain to some of my constituents in Alabama my reasons for the vote I shall now give on a certain section of this bill, which comes to us from a conference committee.

I hold a telegram, signed by a large number of very respectable people in my State, many of whom I know—there are seventeen hundred and forty-five signatures to a single telegram—asking me to vote against the provision reported by that committee in regard to passes. I did not know that my people were so intimately wound up in this business until I commenced getting the returns from the country. I did not have an idea that this great measure, over which the Senate has spent five or six months of lucubration, agitation, and strife, would become suddenly so extremely unpopular as it seems to have done. I expected it to march forth with a flourish of trumpets and to recommend itself to the farthest ends of the earth for its wisdom and patriotism. But the first thing we hear is this tornado of telegrams, coming from all parts of the United States, in regard to its injustice and inequality with respect to certain large numbers and certain large classes of people.

The trouble with that feature of the bill is the same trouble we will find further on in regard to a number of its provisions. It is that the Congress of the United States is here interfering with the rights of the sovereign States of this Union. Unnecessarily, not unwittingly, but purposely, they are tearing down the constitutional borders which protect the people of the different States in the guardianship of their own sovereignties, in taking care of their own households, their lives, their property, and all that belongs to them. The American people will have this as an object lesson for reflection, which, I trust, will instruct them to go back to the days of the fathers and to learn to have a proper appreciation of the value, power, excellence, and eminence of the several respective sovereignties which have sent Senators to sit in this Chamber. I hope Senators will also have better conceptions of the rights of the States they represent, than are manifested in this railroad rate measure.

Besides this single telegram that I have just adverted to, which I will not ask to have printed in the RECORD, because it is so very voluminous, almost like a census, I have hundreds of others, imploring me and instructing me to vote against the interruption of the existing law in regard to passes on railroads.

There is a law in existence in respect to passes on railroads, a pretty strict one. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] had it here to-day, and I want to lay my hand on it, so that I may put it in the RECORD. I will ask leave, without now taking the time of the Senate to look up the statute, to insert one section of the act in my remarks to explain the situation of the law as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave will be granted.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that, if he puts in the section, he get the section of the act of 1887 as amended by the act of 1895?

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I am going to do.

Mr. KEAN. What section of the statute does the Senator want?

Mr. MORGAN. I want to put in the RECORD the status of the law to-day on the question of passes.

Mr. KEAN. It is section 22 of the present law.

Mr. MORGAN. I will get it right in the RECORD. I want to show the people of Alabama the state of the law as it exists to-day under which these privileges have sprung up in their favor, and about the proposed deprivation of which they complain so much.

Section 22 of the act approved February 4, 1887, as amended March 2, 1889, and February 8, 1895, is as follows:

That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and of Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the Boards of Managers of said Homes; nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers and employees; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies: Provided, That no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall prevent the issuance of joint interchangeable 5,000-mile tickets, with special privileges as to the amount of free baggage that may be carried under mileage tickets of one thousand or more miles; but before any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, shall issue any such joint interchangeable mileage tickets with special privileges as aforesaid it shall file with the Interstate Commerce Commission copies of the joint tariffs of rates, fares, or charges on which such joint interchangeable mileage tickets are to be based, together with specifications of the amount of free baggage permitted to be carried under such tickets, in the same manner as common carriers are required to do with regard to other joint rates by section 6 of this act; and all the provisions of said section 6 relating to joint rates, fares, and charges shall be observed by said common carriers and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission as fully with regard to such joint interchangeable mileage tickets as with regard to other joint rates, fares, and charges referred to in said section 6. It shall be unlawful for any common carrier that has issued or authorized to be issued any such joint interchangeable mileage tickets to demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for transportation of persons or baggage under such joint interchangeable mileage tickets than that required by the rate, fare, or charge specified in the copies of the joint tariff of rates, fares, or charges filed with the Commission in force at the time. The provisions of section 10 of this act shall apply to any violation of the requirements of this proviso.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the privileges which the people of Alabama enjoy by the condescension and favor of Congress heretofore under its legislation are those mentioned in this act, under which they have received these benefits and in respect of which they have arranged all their contract relations with the railroad companies, which they now do not wish to have disturbed. They are satisfied with them; the railroad companies are satisfied with them; and I do not know that it is any of our business to produce dissatisfaction between them. I suspect that some Members of Congress are not exactly satisfied with the report of the committee of conference because it will cut them off from some privileges which they enjoy and will be compelled to surrender. They will be so compelled under the force of public opinion, which, I think, is entirely unjust. I have no personal interest in the matter.

We have resolved ourselves into a reform association here in the Senate—a great radical reform association—and our head reformers have been out in a committee of conference for some days and have come back and have reported that they have agreed to a certain report, which is presented here in a most admirable form, perfectly intelligible. They do not tell us about the tribulations they had in coming to that agreement, but, judging from their anxieties exhibited on the floor of the Senate, I suppose they must have suffered a good deal in their combat with each other in the committee room. They are back here with a full agreement in regard to every single item in the bill. Nothing is disagreed to in the committee.

Then a Senator who was a member of the committee rises in the Senate and asks us to disagree to all they have done. "Disagree to all we have done. We have done our best; we have acted righteously, according to what capacity the Almighty has bestowed upon us in the way of mental ability; we have acted up to the top gauge of our ability. Here is the result, and we ask the Senate of the United States to disagree to every word of it and send it back to the committee." They seem to be alarmed at the thoroughness of this startling reformation. I share their worst apprehensions, and they have my condolence.

I suppose we are obliged to do this out of deference to them. But it looks to me very like a case of merely shifting the responsibility. Why did not these conferees stand up in committee and battle for their convictions, like we have been battling here to-day and trying to give them enlightnment, as the Senator from South Carolina says, and information upon these questions? If they had stood to their posts and fought for their principle in that committee room, instead of this being a unanimous report from the entire committee as to every feature of this bill we would have had, perhaps, an agreement as to some features and a disagreement as to others.

But this is a most remarkable proceeding. On the motion of the Senator, a member of the conference committee, to disagree, we find ourselves entering with them into the conference room and resolving the Senate into a sort of committee of the whole on conference, the time spent to-day and yesterday in giving them advice, no two of us agreeing on any matter of importance. This is a conference that only confers, but does not attempt to decide anything.

Some Senators say we can instruct the conferees and others say we can not. My opinion is we can instruct the conferees whenever we choose to do it. We can not offer an amendment to what they propose, but we certainly can instruct them. But we have deliberately declined to offer any instructions. We have offered a great deal of enlightenment, a great deal of information, and a great deal of wisdom and perhaps some unwisdom, and they must take it back and digest it as best they can, and come to another conclusion, which I suppose will be just what it is now—to agree to every feature of the bill, according to what they think is best and right, and advise the Senate to reject their report.

In this report they have found that it is necessary for them to legislate on matters that have not passed either House, and very properly they come out and state that they have taken the function of legislation in their hands in order to make this bill what it ought to be. Well, it needed it, Mr. President. There never was a bill that needed legislation any more than this bill, and I am extremely obliged to the conferees for having entered upon these new suggestions of a legislative sort, which were also agreed to by the House conferees.

I have been all day trying to work out a puzzle in my own mind, and that is what would happen to this bill if the House should agree to the report and the Senate should disagree to it. There is a deadlock I am unable to see through. I can not imagine how we are ever going to get along with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will state that under the custom the House is awaiting our action, and the report has not been presented over there. So the unfortunate deadlock which the Senator foresees is not likely to occur.

Mr. MORGAN. In these later days the best of customs are those that are most abused, and perhaps the House will take a different view. I do not know of any parliamentary law that requires that they shall not act. But suppose they wait until we have acted and we disagree to the report and they take it up and say, "We agree to the whole of it." Where are we? Here is every amendment of the conferees agreed to by them, agreed to also by the House, and the Senate stands by itself, at the invitation of its conferees, disagreeing to all of them. I admit that it is a good deal deeper pit than any heretofore contained in this bill, and some of those have been the most inscrutable of all the holes I have ever tried to look into.

I notice on page 14 the conferees have struck out amendment No. 26 entirely and have substituted in place of it another amendment, as follows:

No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless, etc.

I had supposed that this bill was dealing entirely with common carriers, but the committee have reached out and included all carriers—personal, private, Government carriers. It does not say a word about common carriers. But they take the entire family of carriers and put them in this section.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senate put this in.

Mr. KEAN. That was put in by the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry that it has been visited back on the Senate, because I had hoped the Senate, in its wisdom, had escaped the difficulty and the grotesque situation in which we are put in this legislation. What did the Senate mean by putting personal or private carriers under restrictions that apply to common carriers? The reformation seems to be very sweeping.

There is, nevertheless, in that proposition the real merit, the real foundation of the only interstate-commerce legislation that we can impose upon the railroads of the different States, chartered by them under their own laws and subject to their own regulations. What is that?

No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless, etc.

Put that at the foundation of your law when you are again reporting it, if you find that you must legislate in order to support the reformation, that the Government of the United States intends to take charge under the Constitution of all interstate transportation and make interstate transportation mean interstate commerce, and that no railroad or other common carrier shall participate in this interstate transportation except upon the terms and conditions which the Congress chose to prescribe, and you will have had a law which would obligate every railroad company that undertakes to prosecute the business after the passage of that law to accept and obey every provision in the act, because it would be a contract between it and the United States, or a quasi contract. I am very sorry that while they were dealing with this question—if the Senate is responsible, I am sorry for the Senate; if the committee are responsible, I am sorry for them and the country—that they did not adopt that proposition, and instead of saying—

Unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this act—

They had said, "You shall not engage in interstate transportation unless you obey all the provisions of this act, of every kind and character." You would have eliminated from consideration every constitutional question except the single one as to whether the subject-matter is within the control of Congress; that is, whether transportation is a feature actually of interstate commerce. Everything would have been settled right there. All the trouble we have been having for five months would have been avoided, and Congress would have been building its legislation for the control of railroads upon a principle that is perfectly plain and undeniable.

Referring, however, to the mere matter of posting up placards about the depot, in this act it is proposed to say that if the railroads fail to do that they shall not engage in interstate commerce. An inspector goes around and does not find these bills of freight placarded about the depots, and that railroad company must go out of business. It shall not engage in interstate commerce. It can not do anything. Standing just as it is and without any elaboration, this provision is an absurdity. It is an absurdity to say that a railroad company shall go out of interstate commerce because it does not placard its rates of freight upon the walls of its stations.

I have merely indulged in that criticism in order to bring the Senate to some consideration of what is really the foundation principle of all legislation by Congress in regard to interstate commerce conducted by railroad corporations, which are the creatures of the law in the different States and which are entirely and exclusively under their control. If they are excluded from interstate commerce for not accepting and obeying the acts of Congress, they will accept them.

I wanted, also, to call attention to the great number of difficulties suggested by this provision in amendment 17 that we are going to encounter in regard to all these matters.

Now, in regard to the matter of passes, the committee of conference have acted wisely and patriotically in striking out entirely the section enacted by the Senate on the subject. That was a confused section. It was very partial and very unjustifiable upon any principle of law. I do not speak about the particular people that they tried to accommodate, but on any principle of law it is entirely unjustifiable.

If the Congress of the United States is to prevent the giving of passes by railways to certain classes of people, suppose we change the picture and look at the other side of it. Congress, let us suppose, will make an enactment that you shall give passes to every Member of Congress and to his family. You shall give passes to all Young Men's Christian Associations and to all the beneficent public enterprises, including the negro visitations that they make by tens of thousands on excursion trains in the South. It is a very enlightening and a very cheerful thing to see going through a country 2,000 negroes on a train making an excursion either as deadheads or at a very low rate of freight. It improves conditions. Even the atmosphere seems to be better and more homelike from the fact of their passing through. I dislike the idea that our northern friends are to find this happy recreation cut off by this bill.

Now, Mr. President, what right have we got to say to a railroad company, "You shall not give a pass to a certain person, although he may be in your employment?" You can not give it without in some way or other committing some possible immorality or setting a bad example, one of the two. We are going to take charge of you in a moral sense. We are going to arrange it so that you shall not be tempted to give a pass to anybody either for pity, charity, or religion, or politics, or any other cause. We will fix it so that you shall be absolutely true and upright in all your transactions in regard to giving out passes. At the same time you must remember that we are putting shekels by the shovelful into the treasury of the railroads, for we are making these people pay them money, whereas they would not pay any money when passing free over the interstate railway. We are robbing Peter to pay Paul. I do not know which was the poorer of the two of those great disciples, but we are robbing the poorest that we can find to put money in the treasury of the richest that we can find. The railroads do not seem to complain of this reformation.

Now, that is reform, Mr. President, but it is wrong end foremost. It is not rational reform. It is not what is so frequently described in this bill as "reasonable." Everything that is "unreasonable" connected with railroad transactions throughout the whole country is denounced as being unlawful. We are thus doing an unlawful thing in the proposed amendment by compelling the railroads to collect money for fares, for instance, out of the poor woman who lives here in Pennsylvania and has a splendid husband who runs on a railroad as engineer between Omaha and San Francisco. Winding through the mountain peaks of that region of country, his engine is toppled over into a gulch and he is wounded. She goes piteously to the railroad company that has these through connections. "Will you not give me a pass to go to see my husband?" "No; the law of the United States fines us $1,000 and puts you in jail for asking it."

That is what we are doing here to-day in regard to passes. People who are entitled to the charities of the railroads and receive them abundantly and who are entitled to the charity and benevolence of Congress are turned away for fear somebody might say, "Yes, you conferred a pass and privilege upon a poor woman who wanted to go to see her husband, who had been thrown over the precipice, and you fine her for making the request." Such tears, Mr. President, as she would shed are not going to receive the compulsion of my vote. They are soft enough when they come from the deep, unutterable moving of the heart, but I do not want to crystal them into block salt as a memento of this reformation while she is looking back over her shoulder in despair and in fear of some following evil, as did Lot's wife. I do not want to do that. I do not intend to unite in promoting such a reformation in railroad practices.

The bill is a stigma upon justice, humanity, and charity, and it is done in the name of reform. When reform gets to be radical and persecuting, and gets our committees to doing wrong, I am against reform. Reform has no element of that sort where it is in connection with the slightest tinge of Christian sentiment and love.

This bill, Mr. President, murders every honest sentiment that is connected with charity and benevolence when it denies to these poor people the privilege of accepting from a railroad company such benevolences as that road can confer without the slightest possible loss, and makes the penalty of the application for a pass a cell in a jail or the penitentiary. The committee did very wisely, very patriotically, very justly, and acted in a Christian sense in striking out of this record the provision the Senate had put in. But, Mr. President, it acted also with a great deal of talent in finding a substitute for it. There is the remarkable part of it. There is where my friend from South Carolina is entitled to great credit. I will read that talented production. It is put in capital letters here:

No carrier subject——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator pardon me for an interruption?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It was put in capitals, as all the other amendments made by the conferees were put in capitals, for the purpose of having the attention of Senators directed immediately to what we had done rather than the ordinary method in which conference reports are presented here, where you have to shuffle around and "dig like fits" to know what they have done. We have not concealed anything, whereas in the average conference report you do not know what the conferees have brought about.

Mr. MORGAN. I am delighted with these capitals, Mr. President. They draw my attention to the subject, and more than that, they do honor to the committee for putting them in here, because they call sharp attention to the real distinctions that ought to exist and do exist in the proposed law in regard to this matter of giving passes.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEAN. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he disclaims the authorship of the amendment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Most assuredly I disclaim the authorship, because it is a House amendment. The Senate added an amendment and the House would not accept it, but proposed this as a substitute.

Mr. KEAN. I thought the Senator from Alabama had said that the Senator from South Carolina was the author of the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. No; the Senator from South Carolina never claims anything that does not belong to him. If he wants anything he has no title to, he goes and takes it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEAN. I am glad to know the Senator from South Carolina is not the author of the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from New Jersey knew that before he asked the question.

Mr. KEAN. I only wanted to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN (reading)—

No carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after January 1, 1907, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket.

There is no carrier subject to the provisions of this act that has got any right to give an interstate free ticket. A railroad company in Alabama can not give an interstate free ticket outside of the borders of that State to anybody. They may make some arrangement by which they will recognize the privileges that are conferred and adopt them in the State of Georgia, for instance, after the man has passed out of Alabama on an Alabama railroad until he gets to Columbus, Ga. But the words "interstate free ticket" are here and they appear again:

Any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passage. Any carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000; and any person who uses, solicits, or accepts for himself or for another any such interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be subject to a like penalty.

A person goes to a railroad office in Alabama and asks for a State ticket, under State law and State permission, to go to Decatur, Ala., which is near the border of the State, or farther up to Athens, in Alabama. "Certainly, we will grant you that." Congress does not pretend to punish that. The State has the right to authorize the pass. It authorizes the issue of the pass. The railroad has the right to issue it and does issue it, and there is no harm done, and no law of Congress violated. It is only when the office in Mobile undertakes to give interstate transportation, transportation reaching into Tennessee and Kentucky, that this law is violated.

"Why," says the poor applicant for a pass, "I do not want it—I do not ask for it any farther than the State line of Alabama. I happen to have here, through the influence and assistance of a friend in Kentucky, another one in Tennessee, passes also through those States, and I have nothing to do but to show them to the conductor and go along," and there need not be any interstate agreement about it.

Now, that is the talented part of this new provision. It does not do a bit of harm; and I want to explain to my people that these gentlemen on this conference committee have not been trying to deprive them of any right or privileges they have enjoyed heretofore, but they have merely put the railroad companies to the inconvenience of issuing separate tickets for each State through which they pass.

Now, what will be done with an indictment for giving an interstate pass? When you come to prove your case you find that the pass did not go beyond the limits of the State.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is a great lawyer and he knows that Congress has no power to prohibit or regulate railroads within a State. The Supreme Court has said time and time again that Congress can do nothing.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator must allow me to say the Supreme Court have said so in so many different ways I do not think I know it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only standing by what I understand to be the law. Now, then, if we are allowed here to regulate only interstate commerce and traffic or passenger rates between States where the railroad crosses the State line, does the Senator think, as a lawyer, that the issuance by a railroad of State passes good within the State would not come within the provisions here of interstate traffic? In other words, would not the man receiving and undertaking to pass over from one State into another and using the State pass in a different State from the one in which he lived be liable to punishment, and would not the railroad be liable to punishment?

Mr. MORGAN. That would be a conspiracy to violate the law of the United States. It would take two consenting parties, the railroad, if you please, the recipient of the pass, and the next railroad conductor or railroad company that might take a pass that was given in the other State.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nevertheless, Mr. President, if a resident of Alabama receiving a pass from the Mobile and Ohio road, good in Alabama, lawful in Alabama, travels to the Mississippi State line and then pulls out a pass in Mississippi over the same road, he has become an interstate passenger and the railroad which issued two passes with a view to allowing him to evade the act of Congress would be liable for punishment, and the man himself would be liable also.

Mr. MORGAN. That would be about as hard a case to make out in law or before a jury as could well be conceived of, if the prosecutor knew with absolute certainty of such a situation as that.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Alabama is correct, then Congress is helpless to stop this abuse.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not an abuse. It is a kindness. It is justice. It is a rightful act. I have not said it was "righteousness."

Mr. TILLMAN. It is considered to be an abuse by the people for public officers—Senators and Members of Congress and legislators and judges—to ride on free passes while they have to pay; and that is really at the root of all the agitation to do away with the free-pass evil, if it is an evil. The Senator says it is not an evil. There are millions of people in the United States who think it is, and I think they are going to continue to demand that Congress shall do something to stop it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a sort of dog in the manger policy that never had any acceptance in my philosophy, and certainly not in my legislative action, that a man should get angry because another man had received benefaction from some friend. He might as well get angry at him for having received a legacy.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will excuse me just a second. Apply it to other public functionaries, for whom this same law would apply with full force. Suppose the keeper of a great hotel, or a little one, either, invites a friend to come and spend the night with him, and he charges the man that travels along with him $5 or $2.50 for the night's lodging and his food, has that man any right to complain that this innkeeper invited his friend to come and spend the night with him? Congress has got just as much power to punish an innkeeper for doing a thing of that sort as it has to punish a railroad. The morality of the proposition is exactly the same.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator ought not to say that after the concession the other day by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] that the Shoreham Hotel is not a common carrier.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not heard about that. Most of the hotels in Washington appear to be judged as common carriers by the various descriptions of things and people they entertain. I should say they were all common carriers.

Mr. GALLINGER. They carry all our money away.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not merry about this. I am as much in earnest about this as I possibly can be in view of a subject that is so grotesquely ridiculous.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. May I interrupt the Senator from Alabama only to ask him if he would not prefer to continue his remarks to-morrow? I do not want them cut off.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I am now just about through.

Mr. FORAKER. I am enjoying them very much, as everyone else is; but it is getting to be a very late hour.

Mr. MORGAN. I think I have demonstrated that the Senator from South Carolina has made an escape for my people which they can avail themselves of without any difficulty, by simply getting a pass across the State of Alabama, it being about 250 miles across the State of Alabama, and they can go perfectly safe on the Alabama pass, and then have a Mississippi pass for the other part of the journey, which would practically be 5 miles or 10 miles into the State of Mississippi. The Senator from South Carolina has provided against that; and I do not want to see anybody criticise the Senator who has been making such manly efforts to try to escape the results of association with gentlemen who are engaged in a great moral crusade, and who began this crusade by tearing out of the present law of the United States express provisions of the Constitution of the United States in amendment No. 7 of the Constitution, providing for that, which this Senate and this committee so far seems to have entirely ignored and thrown aside—that great right of the people to demand a trial by jury.

Put the people on the jury bench to try all these cases, and you will have the law properly administered, and, in the end—not in every case, but in the great average of cases—you will have it right. They will settle all questions as to the reasonableness of rates, and they will settle them after all Congress can do to prevent it. This Congress may try every power and faculty of absolutism that it can conceive of, but it can not take away from any court of the United States the right to determine whether a rate charged by anybody is reasonable—I do not care whether it is charged by a direct act of Congress or by a railroad company or by a railroad commission. That reasonableness that enters into the contract itself, into the essence of the employment, stands there, and the courts, as far back as courts have sat anywhere in Christendom, have always assumed the right to exercise their judgment in regard to the reasonableness of any rate that might be charged by any carrier to a shipper; and they will never give it up. Unless you intend to enforce these rates at the end of a bayonet, instead of enforcing them through the courts of justice, you will find the courts of justice will never accept from the Congress of the United States any rate that, according to the conscience of the courts, is not reasonable. You can not prescribe it in such a form as to compel the courts to accept it.

I think, Mr. President, that explains all I wish to say to my constituents on the subject of this bill. I am really addressing the thousands of my constituents who deplore our action on this bill. I honor them, because they are worthy of honor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I am very anxious to get this interesting and enlightening debate finished and to get the bill back into conference; but a half dozen Senators, or something like that number, have indicated that they want to speak. So I can not hope to get a vote to-night without great discomfort and the possibility of the loss of a quorum. Therefore, I give notice that to-morrow, when the Senate meets at 2 o'clock, I shall ask that we proceed immediately with the consideration of the conference report without any morning business or any other matter intervening; and I will try to get a vote before we adjourn, if the Senate will stand by me.

I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Carolina withhold that motion for the present, while the Chair lays before the Senate certain messages from the House of Representatives?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM IN MINNESOTA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5357) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River above the village of Monticello, Wright County, Minn., which were on page 3, line 15, to strike out "three years" and insert "one year;" and on page 3, line 16, to strike out "six years" and insert "three years."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION AS TO SPONGES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4806) to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "the passage of this act" and insert "May 1, A. D. 1907;" and, on page 1, line 10, after "act," to insert:

And provided further, That no sponge shall be landed, delivered, cured, or offered for sale at any port or place in the United States of a smaller size than 4 inches in diameter.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CERTAIN LANDS IN IDAHO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4862) allowing settlers with permanent improvements on the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, to buy lots on which said improvements are located at an appraised price for cash, which were, in lines 6 and 7 to strike out "the approval of this act" and insert "March 5, 1906;" in lines 7 and 8, to strike out "and with substantial improvements;" and in line 9 to strike out "occupied by them" and insert "so built upon."

Mr. DUBOIS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. ANKENY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. DUBOIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIANS OF RICHARDSON COUNTY, NEBR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2418) to enable the Indians allotted lands in severalty within the boundaries of drainage district No. 1, in Richardson County, Nebr., to protect their lands from overflow, and for the segregation of such of said Indians from their tribal relations as may be expedient, and for other purposes, which was, on page 3, line 14, after "discretion," to insert "upon application."

Mr. BURKETT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I now renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 7, 1906, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 6, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT MERCHANT MARINE COMMISSION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplemental report from the Merchant Marine Commission, which I ask to have printed as a document, and at the same time I ask unanimous consent that the minority may present their views at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to file a supplemental report upon the Merchant Marine Commission; also that the minority may have leave to file a report.

Mr. SULZER. What is the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is no bill; it is a supplemental report from the Merchant Marine Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio if the request is put that way the minority would have only this legislative day in which to file the minority report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, they may have ten days.

The SPEAKER. That they may have ten days in which to file the report and the same be printed as a document. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18030) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SCOTT, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. PETTUS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5924. An act to extend the provisions of the existing bounty-land laws to the officers and enlisted men, and the officers and men of the boat companies, of the Florida Seminole Indian war; and

S. 6299. An act for the relief of Pollard & Wallace.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 18750. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 1160) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Swords, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19432) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NELSON, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 9813) granting a pension to Hariet P. Sanders, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 239. An act relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6299. An act for the relief of Pollard & Wallace—to the Committee on Claims.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] and one hour to be controlled by myself, and pending the submission of that request I will state the reason for it is this: As most Members know, the time of final adjournment of Congress depends more now upon the speedy consideration and passage of the sundry civil appropriation bill than perhaps any other bill or subject that is before Congress at this time, and Members who desire to deliver speeches on other topics will have an opportunity of doing so on the bill which will follow this, which, I am informed, is a bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee revising or amending the administrative tariff act, and also on the general deficiency appropriation bill, which will be the last appropriation bill presented to the House for consideration, and I trust, therefore, that unanimous consent for closing general debate after two hours will be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill; and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to state that before the necessity for closing up debate on this bill became apparent I had promised time in general debate on this bill. If those promises were fulfilled, it would consume twelve hours of time. I therefore feel constrained to object to closing general debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think if my colleague will state to the House that when the deficiency bill comes these twelve hours can be provided for, he will have no more trouble.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, of course I can not make a promise here that would bind the House or the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not ask you to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand there will probably be two days of general debate on the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. The general deficiency bill is generally held in the House until the light of adjournment is visible at the other end of the Capitol, which time is consumed largely in general debate. I can not make any promise. I can merely make a statement of the custom in the consideration of the general deficiency bill, and also the information which I have received that opportunity for general debate will be given on the customs administrative bill, reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. It is very necessary, if we are to facilitate the work that must be done before Congress adjourns, that this bill be considered as speedily as possible. There is a great deal in this bill that will provoke legitimate debate, and wide latitude will be allowed in the consideration of the various provisions of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question with reference to the consideration of the bill. There is a provision in the bill providing for an investigation of the structural material matter. It is very important, and it could not be discussed fully under the five-minute rule. I would like to ask the gentleman, if we will make this consent order on general debate if he would be disposed to allow some latitude on that question?

Mr. TAWNEY. It will not be my purpose to prevent latitude of discussion of that question or of all other questions where the debate is limited and confined to the subject-matter before the Committee of the Whole at that time; but in view of the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is not necessary to waste any further time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this hope that we would have time for general debate later upon other bills, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he has heard that there has been any meeting of the leaders of his side of the House with a view to cutting off all general debate for the balance of this session?

Mr. TAWNEY. I have not heard of any such meeting, have no knowledge of any meeting, and do not believe there has been a meeting of that kind nor for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very glad to hear it, because it has been rumored, and I did not know whether it was true or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There are several propositions involved here upon which speech is desired on this side of the House, and it will be impossible to make any combination of that sort.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to announce to the House now, in order that Members may know what the purpose of the committee is in respect to the matter of closing debate, that I intend to occupy only about twenty-five minutes in my opening statement, and will yield twenty-five minutes remaining of my hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], and at the conclusion of the hour I will move that the committee rise, go into the House, and endeavor to close debate by motion in the House. I do this, Mr. Chairman, because I am confident that every Member of the House who wishes to deliver a speech upon any subject foreign to the bill under consideration will have ample opportunity to do so after this bill passes and goes to the Senate. We all know that more time is consumed in the consideration, and properly so, of the sundry civil appropriation bill in the Senate than in the consideration of any other appropriation bill that is considered by Congress; and during that time I feel confident that there will be ample opportunity for everybody who desires to speak to be heard on the floor of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for an interruption?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to make a statement, not a question, just for a moment.

Mr. TAWNEY. I must beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is affecting this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have reserved to myself only twenty-five minutes, with the understanding that I am going to yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will ask a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no time to yield to gentlemen to make statements, but I yield for a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am sorry the gentleman seems to doubt my sincerity when I say that the statement is one affecting this bill, and it will be shorter than the question would be, and it is pertinent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Go ahead.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are some gentlemen in this House who will speak to the pending bill and who do not always seek an opportunity to publish to their constituents, and that there are a great many things in this bill which affect the conduct of this Government for the next year which some gentlemen wish to talk about, and it is not fair to assume that all of us want to speak to the galleries or to the newspapers, and it is not fair to limit the time to one hour on this, one of the greatest and most important bills before Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I will say that I feel quite confident that when items in which Members are interested are reached in the consideration of this bill in the committee, under the five-minute rule, there will be ample opportunity for any Member who desires to discuss the provision under consideration to do so. I do not wish to take advantage of anybody, but I want, if possible, to expedite the consideration and passage of this bill as much as possible.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman that I never consume more than a few minutes of the time of this House, and those who speak to the bill do not generally consume a great deal of time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia is entirely right in saying that there is perhaps no appropriation bill submitted to the House of Representatives, or that originates in this body, of greater importance than the sundry civil appropriation bill. This bill carries appropriations for all the sundry civil expenses of the Government. It is a bill that comes closer to the people than almost any other appropriation bill enacted by Congress; a bill that affects more directly the material welfare of the people than any other. It is the bill that provides for all the aids to commerce and navigation which the Government of the United States furnishes. It is also the bill that provides all the facilities that enable the people of the United States to conveniently transact their business with the various branches of the Government. The bill therefore affects directly the interests of more of the constituents of Members of this House than any other appropriation bill, and it is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I have desired to confine the debate to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, my time is very limited, and I shall have to confine myself as briefly as possible to a general statement of the appropriations recommended by the bill, and also to a statement respecting some of the legislative provisions which the committee have recommended.

The total appropriation for the sundry civil expenses for the current fiscal year is $67,163,600.66.

The estimates submitted by the Departments for the next fiscal year aggregate $105,416,576.89.

The total appropriations recommended by the committee for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year 1907 is $94,342,156.42, being $11,074,420.47 less than the regular and supplemental estimates.

Of the total amount carried in this bill $25,456,575.08 is for the construction of the Panama Canal and is reimbursable from the proceeds of the sale of bonds.

In addition to this sum, the amount carried for river and harbor improvements made necessary by river and harbor acts, and especially by the act passed at the last session of Congress, is in excess of the amount appropriated in the current law for that purpose by $6,774,844.14.

Adding, therefore, the Panama Canal appropriations to the excess over the current law for river and harbor improvements, and deducting that amount from the aggregate amount carried in this bill, leaves $62,110,737.20, or $5,052,863.46 less than the amount appropriated for sundry civil expenses for the current fiscal year.

The above-mentioned items, namely, for construction of the isthmian canal and to meet river and harbor contract obligations, are to meet the demands of previous legislation and upon which the committee had no opportunity to revise or reduce.

By comparing the other items upon which the committee used their discretion, a reduction of $5,052,863.46 is made under the current law.

Mr. Chairman, in the investigation of the estimates submitted by the various Departments for the sundry civil expenses for the next fiscal year, the committee gave those items the most careful investigation and consideration. I think the subcommittee having charge of the preparation of this bill consumed at least six weeks in the hearings before the committee, if not more, and the printed stenographic report of the hearings contains over 1,500 pages of printed matter.

I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in presenting any further details. The report of the committee gives a full and complete statement of all increases and decreases recommended. I have made an analysis of the bill, however, which I will print in connection with my remarks, which shows that there are sixteen items in the bill carrying $82,277,767.42, and four of these items aggregate $54,649,551.22. This leaves a balance of $12,064,389, and this sum is distributed amoug 176 different items, as follows:

The committee has also reported in this bill various legislative provisions, and I beg the indulgence of the House while I explain briefly these provisions.

I know the Committee of the Whole has in times past criticised the Committee on Appropriations for reporting legislative provisions in appropriation bills. I want to say, in respect to these provisions, there is not one of them that, if adopted, will enact any rule of action for the people, and therefore are not in that sense legislative provisions. There is no provision recommended in this bill that concerns the fundamental principles of government in the least. They are restrictive and wholly remedial in their character.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will.

Mr. HULL. Because I should like a little information. On page 115 of the bill there is an appropriation of $150,000 which will probably be for an artillery post (they call it a target range) in a place where there is no post established now, and in a locality where there is no authorization by any committee of the House for such an appropriation. Will the gentleman please explain it? I should like light.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that when that item is reached in the bill I will explain the matter to him. The appropriation is recommended on the basis of the estimates submitted by the War Department. The amount has been reduced, but the matter will be discussed and explained fully, and I hope to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Iowa when the item is reached.

Mr. HULL. The reason I ask the question is simply because the Department requested the Military Committee to authorize the establishment of certain camps, this among others, and that committee refused to authorize them, and then the Department went to your committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. I may say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that the item was submitted in the original estimates to the Committee on Appropriations and is not for the establishment of a "camp."

The first legislative provision to which I will call attention is one that will doubtless provoke some discussion. It may be subject to a point of order; but I want to explain to the committee the facts, and before I do that I want to call attention generally to these provisions and to say that they are the result of the investigation which the committee had made, not only of the estimates for the next fiscal year, but of the expenditures made in the current and previous years. This investigation disclosed some features of administration (I might call them abuses of administration in some instances) that ought to be remedied, concerning which no other committee in this House could have information, for the reason that they would not have occasion to investigate the subject, and all these provisions result from that fact.

While it is true the letter of the rules of the House prohibits the reporting of legislative provisions on an appropriation bill, nevertheless when that committee, which is the only committee of the House that is required in the preparation of its bills to investigate methods of administration and public expenditure, find abuses that should be remedied, it is its duty to call to the attention of the House not only the necessity for legislation, but the provisions that in the judgment of the committee would correct such abuses and promote better and safer administration.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, these provisions are all remedial and restrictive in their character, and relate only to administration and economy as well as safety in the expenditure of the public money. For example, take the transportation of notes, bonds, and other securties of the United States and the fractional and minor coin. This recommendation provides that these securities and this coin shall, when practicable, be transported by registered mail and in such sums as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, under such rules and conditions as may be agreed upon by him and the Postmaster-General.

During the current year there is appropriated for the transportation of currency, of Government securities, transportation of silver coin and minor coin about $350,000 in all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not sure that I understood the gentleman's first statement. You recommend that the coin shall, under proper conditions and agreement between the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, be transmitted by mail?

Mr. TAWNEY. By registered mail.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is the gentleman familiar with the provision which the House has adopted taking all such matters away from the mail and transmitting them by other methods?

Mr. TAWNEY. Coin and currency?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Matters that are really freight and express.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know to what provisions the gentleman refers. I knew there was some provision of that kind. Does it apply to the shipment of money by registered mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It seeks to keep out everything that is not properly mailable.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not money properly mailable?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not in bulk.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that the banks all over the country are transporting money by registered mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at the expense of the Government, but at the expense of the banks. You propose to require the postal department to accept that expense?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; we make an appropriation to defray the expenses of transporting this coin and currency.

Mr. OVERSTREET. At what rate?

Mr. TAWNEY. At such rate as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General and under such rules and regulations as they may jointly make.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why not take the regular rate?

Mr. TAWNEY. They can do that, but the objection to taking the regular rate is that there is a regulation that a registered package shall not weigh over 4 pounds.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What prevents them to-day from doing that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because if you take a thousand dollars of silver, weighing about 60 pounds, it would have to be split up into as many different packages as 4 goes into 60.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Doesn't the gentleman know that money has been transported by the Treasury Department through the mails, freight in bulk, weighing more than 60 pounds?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; I know that there was a whole train load of gold brought from San Francisco to the Philadelphia mint as a result of a holdup on the part of the express companies, and thereby the Government saved $25,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In what way?

Mr. TAWNEY. By the difference in the cost of transportation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the Government had to pay for it at Government rates.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; but not at express rates.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In some of the instances the Government rates are higher than the express rates, but not necessarily so.

Mr. TAWNEY. As a result of this provision we were able to reduce the expenses of transportation of currency and coin about $91,000, all of which has heretofore gone to the express companies, and it will result in the money being taken from one pocket of the Government and put into the other.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Very well.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Heretofore we have had an appropriation to pay for the express charges in transporting silver coin. Now the gentleman proposes to send it by mail. How are you going to haul it and who is going to take care of it? I think the gentleman's proposition is a good one.

Mr. TAWNEY. The same as money in the bank is transported by registered mail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How is it going to be taken care of?

Mr. TAWNEY. The same as money is being taken care of that is transported by registered mail by the bank.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To go by freight?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is to be transported by registered mail, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General may agree upon. Heretofore the appropriations for this purpose have always read "for the transportation of silver coin," or other money and securities of the Government, "by registered mail or otherwise," and not a dollar, so far as the committee could ascertain, has ever been shipped by registered mail. It has all been shipped by express, and the express companies have received the amount appropriated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And it eliminates the excessive express rates altogether.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understand that the real effect will be to permit this transportation by mail regardless of the 4-pound limit of weight.

Mr. TAWNEY. Provided the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury agree.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But now the banks are not permitted to send by registered mail in excess of the 4-pound limit.

Mr. TAWNEY. This changes the law to that effect as to the Government only.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you make any provision there for the dirty money that we had up in the sundry civil bill once?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What kind of an appropriation is allowed there for the expense of that transportation?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is the defference between, I think, $320,000 and $91,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is to say, you reduce the amount of the appropriation heretofore carried to $80,000.

Mr. KEIFER. To about $91,000. That is the total reduction.

Mr. TAWNEY. On page 6 of the report it will be found that reference is made to the fact that there is a limitation of $100,000 for school purposes in the district of Alaska, under which limitation it will be impossible to employ a special agent for investigating the schools of Alaska at a compensation in excess of $1,200 a year, including the traveling expenses and a per diem of $4 a day. I presume that Members of the House are familiar with the reason for that limitation. In the hearings it developed that about a year ago a gentleman named Churchill, who was then employed in the Interior Department receiving an annual compensation of $2,500, resigned and was appointed a special agent to go to Alaska for the purpose of investigating the schools of the district of Alaska and the propagation of reindeer.

Mr. MANN. By whom was he appointed?

Mr. TAWNEY. By the Secretary of the Interior, at a compensation of $751 per month and his traveling expenses. The gentleman was also authorized to go by way of Boston and Montreal. He spent about three and one-half months in Alaska and about four and one-half months in the States at that compensation, preparing his reports, and the committee felt that that was an unjustifiable expenditure. In order to prevent a repetition of such an extravagant expenditure from this appropriation we have recommended this limitation.

There are a number of other minor provisions recommended. There is one provision which will require the heads of all of the Executive Departments within thirty days after the close of each fiscal year to submit to the Secretary of the Treasury a statement of all moneys received during the year from the sale of public property or from any other source and not deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Then the Secretary of the Treasury will be required to submit that statement to Congress with the reasons for the failure to deposit such funds in the Treasury. The reason for that grows out of the fact, as will be seen from the hearings, that the Secretary of the Interior, under an act approved March 3, 1901, sold some town lots in the Territory of Oklahoma, as he was authorized to do. The proceeds of the sale of these lots aggregated $738,000. In the judgment of the Auditor for the Interior Department, in the judgment of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and also in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that fund should have been deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Secretary of the Treasury or to the credit of the general fund. Instead of that, the money was deposited in the subtreasury of the United States at St. Louis to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior, upon the theory that Congress had authorized that out of the proceeds of the sale of these lots certain improvements should be made in these various towns, such as the building of schoolhouses, court-houses, bridges, streets, etc., and that therefore this money need not be deposited in the Treasury. These expenditures were made under the direction of the Director of the Geological Survey, the vouchers transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and the money paid on the check of the Secretary.

The Auditor for the Interior Department informed the committee that none of these expenditures had been audited. There was an investigation some time ago of the transaction, but there has been no official audit of the expenditures made prior to the time the Auditor for the Interior Department appeared before the committee. Members of the House will find in the hearings a full and complete statement of the facts.

The committee in reporting this provision does not do so because it has reason to question either the amount received or the amount or legality of the expenditures made on the official check of the Secretary. His integrity or honesty is not questioned. The committee exonerates him from any blame in the premises, except his acknowledged ignorance of the law requiring the deposit in the Treasury of all public moneys and his failure to have the expenditure of these funds audited as the expenditures of all other public funds are required to be audited.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, the committee have recommended the following provision:

SEC. 9. Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall require, and it shall be the duty of the head of each Executive Department or other Government establishment to furnish him, within thirty days after the close of each fiscal year, a statement of all money arising from proceeds of public property of any kind or from any source other than the postal service, received by said head of Department or other Government establishment during the previous fiscal year for or on account of the public service or in any other manner in the discharge of his official duties other than as salary or compensation, which was not paid into the General Treasury of the United States, together with a detailed account of all payments, if any, made from such funds during such year. All such statements, together with a similar statement applying to the Treasury Department, shall be transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

If this provision had been the law, the Secretary of the Interior would have been obliged to submit a statement of that transaction to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury would have been obliged to transmit that statement to Congress with the reason of the Secretary for his failure to deposit the sum of $738,000 in the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to notify the gentleman in accordance with his request that he has consumed twenty-five minutes' time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman yields the floor, I understand there is an item in the bill of $25,000——

Mr. TAWNEY. We will get at that under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But I desire ask——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that a member of the committee desires to discuss this under general debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A member of the committee desires time to discuss this bill under general debate, and I think the gentleman ought to give it to him. I refer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE].

Mr. TAWNEY. I still do not catch what the gentleman says.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE], a member of the committee, desires about forty minutes to discuss this bill under general debate. I think the gentleman from Minnesota should give him that time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think before beginning a discussion of some features of this bill that the attention of the House ought to be called to the extraordinary manner in which the debate upon this bill has been cut off. I do not mean to assert anyone is guilty of bad faith in the premises, but I assert that it is a most unfortunate happening. A bill that ought to give to the Members of this House (touching, as it does, every portion of the United States in vital parts) almost unlimited opportunity of debate is cut down under the method proposed by the chairman of the committee to one hour. I do not know what the influences were which were set in motion to bring about this result. I do know, however, that upon this side of the House a very important speech was made early in the session showing clearly that the watch trust of the United States sold its product abroad cheaper than it did in this country. That speech had a great effect upon the country. It was answered upon the Republican side by two or three critics. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] intended in the general debate upon this bill to close his remarks upon that subject and demonstrate absolutely the truth of the assertions which he made. I know that the request was made of me to do all in my power as a Massachusetts man to prevent the gentleman from Illinois from making his speech upon that subject. I do not say those influences were exercised upon the Republican side of the House, but at all events the extraordinary result has happened, the first time I have ever heard of it, of shutting off all debate beyond one hour upon this most important bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the House at this time in the session ought to devote twelve hours to political debate on each side of the House, thereby preventing the consideration of the pure-food bill?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, any course should be adopted which would exclude from consideration any important measure.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman must be aware that general debate upon this bill would have that effect.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I am not aware of that, Mr. Chairman, any more than general debate which has heretofore taken place has had that effect.

Mr. MANN. Well, it has had that effect up to date.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. For myself I would prefer we would remain in session until all subjects of legislation were properly debated and properly considered by this House; and if we upon this side had our way, sir, we would amend the rules so as to give the people of this country as well as the Members of this House the advantages of full and free debate upon all measures. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman and I would probably stay, but when it comes to staying the gentleman's side of the House will probably disappear.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You have a majority of a hundred and twelve, and you should stay and do business.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows well you can not keep them all here——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman will pardon me if I proceed, as under the rule I have only twenty-five minutes and I would like to discuss some questions which arose in the consideration of the bill. The first matter that this House ought to decide is the question of the type of canal which we will construct at Panama. The hearings developed the fact that the engineers are now seriously embarrassed in the work by reason of the failure of Congress to decide what kind of a canal should be constructed. We all assumed that the President had exercised the supposed discretion, under the Spooner Act, and decided in favor of the lock type; but Engineer Stevens has informed us that he has received no instructions; that the question is still an open one; that the prosecution of the work from now on will be seriously impeded, many delays will be caused, and much money will be wasted unless Congress at this session shall determine which type of canal we shall construct.

Another matter of great importance is the question of the purchase of supplies for the Panama Canal. An attempt will be made here on the part of the ultraprotectionists to limit the free exercise of the power of the Canal Commission to purchase its supplies under circumstances of the greatest competition. The purchasing agent of the Commission, Mr. Ross, and the president of the Commission, Mr. Shonts, both informed the committee that such a policy would result in the waste of a great deal of the nation's money. I understand that the amendment will give to the President the right to permit the canal authorities to purchase their supplies from abroad only in those cases where the prices charged by American manufacturers are "unreasonable and extortionate." The word "unreasonable," of course, would have no meaning whatever in such connection, for the word "extortionate" would control the meaning of that clause; and inasmuch as "extortion" is an unlawful exaction, the President would have to be convinced that an unlawful attempt to compel exorbitant prices was being made as the result of some combination among domestic manufacturers.

The result of that amendment would be that the President would never exercise that discretion. The Canal Commision would be compelled to purchase its supplies from American manufacturers, and the result would be that the taxpayers of the nation would have an immense amount of money added to the bill for the digging of the canal. Both of these Republican officials stated that at the present time 98½ per cent of the canal supplies were purchased from American manufacturers. The amendment would add, therefore, only the balance, or 1½ per cent, to sales of American manufacturers; but this would follow: On the 100 per cent or 98½ per cent which they would purchase the people of the United States would be compelled to pay an immensely enlarged amount. Both Mr. Shonts and Mr. Ross testified that they used their ability to purchase in the markets abroad merely as a club to compel American manufacturers to sell at their export prices, namely, at reasonable prices, fixed under competitive conditions.

Now, I trust the House will not hamper the Canal Commission in its endeavor to build for us in the quickest possible manner and at the lowest possible cost the canal that we all desire to see finished.

Another matter that came before the committee was the question of extending the investigation of structural materials and analyzing coals, peats, lignites, and other fuel materials. The committee has made an appropriation of $50,000 and $100,000, respectively, for these purposes.

The present high prices of building materials, steel, and lumber have made it absolutely necessary for the people of the United States to find some cheap substitutes for these. Reinforced concrete seems to be the hope of the industrial classes of the United States that are engaged in building enterprises. There are immense deposits of sand and stone in the United States suitable for making cement, which will be used in this concrete. The testimony of the experts before the committee, particularly that of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and Professor Holmes, of the Geological Survey, has shown the immense value of this building material to the United States Government and the people generally; but it is necessary that science shall take some more steps before the business world shall follow and complete the investigation. There is no corporation, notwithstanding the marvelous extent of the resources of some, that is to-day fitted to conduct this experiment upon the large scale which is necessary for the final determination of the value of these materials. The Government alone is capable of doing it; and I trust, therefore, that the House will support the action of the committee and appropriate the $50,000 required for the further investigation of the structural materials of the United States.

The coal of this country is not being mined to the extent that it should be. Much of the coal is not taken from the mines at all. Much of that which is taken is not consumed. We are consuming only a small percentage of the heat units in coal. Science has taken hold of this problem. It is conducting experiments, it is finding ways to utilize more of the heat units of coal and to render available to commerce much of the coal which now remains in the mines, which is now thought to be commercially unprofitable to extract. It is necessary to conduct these analyses of coal and peat and lignite, of which there are large deposits in the United States, in order that later commerce may take advantage of the investigations which science has made and give to the people of the United States relief from the present high prices of fuel.

Now, in my remaining time, Mr. Chairman, I will call attention to some violations of the law by heads of Departments who are members of the Cabinet of the President. Three specific violations of the law were called to the attention of the committee. One of them has been narrated by the chairman of the committee, namely, the improper manner of handling the town-lot funds of Oklahoma by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock, and it is not necessary for me to do more than briefly sketch that transaction.

Under the act of March 3, 1901, the Secretary of the Interior was given authority to sell town lots in the Territory of Oklahoma, and with the proceeds to construct roads, erect bridges, court-houses, jails, and other public buildings. Over $730,000 was realized from the sale of these town lots, and the public works mentioned were erected out of the sum. The course of the Secretary of the Interior in the collection and disbursement of the fund is marked by that high regard for honesty and economy for which he is justly distinguished. The committee recognized this fact, and therefore expressly disclaims any intention to reflect in the slightest degree upon his personal honor or integrity. The charge I make is that he violated the law in two important particulars. The money received was not paid into the United States Treasury as a part of the general fund of the Government, and no account of it was rendered to the Treasury Department. Section 9, clause 6, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public moneys shall be published from time to time.

The object of this provision is to secure to the people of this country a proper statement upon the books of the Treasury Department of the receipts and expenditures of all public funds. The Secretary of the Treasury is required by law to render to Congress at each session a statement of his accounts showing the receipts and expenditures of all public moneys, and the law also requires him to report to Congress "such officers and administrative departments and offices of the Government as were, respectively, at any time during the last preceding fiscal year, delinquent in rendering or transmitting accounts to the proper offices in Washington and the cause therefor." (29 Stat. L., 179.)

Notwithstanding the law, the Secretary of the Interior failed to deposit the Oklahoma town-lot funds in the Treasury of the United States as part of the Government funds; he failed to render an account of receipts and expenditures to the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury neglected his duty to report such delinquencies to Congress. The money in question was deposited in a subtreasury, at St. Louis, to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior and disbursed by him. The Secretary defends his course on the ground that the statute made the Oklahoma town-lot funds a special fund of which he was the trustee, and that he was therefore excused from depositing the money and accounting for the same in the regular manner provided by the Constitution and the laws. An examination of his testimony before the committee will convince every Member of the House that his defense is not tenable under a proper reading of the statute. Furthermore, it is certain that if the acts under consideration were committed by a dishonest Secretary instead of the honest Secretary we are dealing with, the most dangerous results might have followed. It would be much easier to misappropriate public funds under the practice established in this case than it would be if the money were paid into the Treasury to the credit of the United States, disbursed therefrom, properly audited by the Auditor for the Interior Department, and the whole accounted for in the regular manner to the Treasury Department. The regular system of accounting would quickly subject an attempted fraud to detection, for that system sets up the officers of one Department as a check upon the officers in another Department, and Congress then scrutinizes both Departments. Under the system established in the collection and disbursement of the Oklahoma town-lot funds the whole transaction was under the sole direction and control of the Secretary of the Interior from the beginning to the end, unrestrained and unexamined by the officials of any other Department of the Government or by Congress.

Another violation of the law, to my mind more flagrant and with far less excuse, was committed by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson.

On February 9, 1903, Congress passed an act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to construct a commodious and fireproof building for the accommodation of the Department of Agriculture, including all of its bureaus and offices now occupying rented quarters in the District of Columbia, and directed him to remove the present building upon the grounds of the Agricultural Department. The Secretary had previously asked Congress for $2,500,000, to be spent in the execution of a plan for the erection of all necessary buildings for his Department. Such a bill passed the Senate, but failed to pass the House, and in the next Congress the act was passed which I have mentioned, authorizing the expenditure of $1,500,000 as the total limit of cost. The Secretary is erecting two wings upon the Agricultural grounds, upon which will be spent the $1,500,000 which Congress clearly intended should house the entire forces of the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary admits that the building he is constructing will not accommodate the entire Department, but only the laboratories and the library, and that the remainder of his force, including the administrative force, will be obliged to remain in the old administration building, which the law expressly says should be removed. Now, the result of this proceeding is that Congress will be obliged at a later day to appropriate another million or a million five hundred thousand dollars to execute the plans which the Secretary of Agriculture had in mind from the beginning. It will be necessary to erect these additional buildings to accommodate the entire Department.

I went upon the grounds yesterday and saw these two wings there upon B street. I asked a common employee what was the plan for further buildings, and this wayfaring man told us that it was the intention to go across B street and erect two more wings, and subsequently to connect the four wings and make them one entire building, for the accommodation of the entire Department.

The Secretary of Agriculture came before the committee and said that he was not going to ask Congress for additional money, but the common laborer upon the grounds knows better. He knows the plan, and every Member of this House, if he reads the RECORD, will know that not only has the Secretary violated the law, but that he has violated it deliberately, and that he intended to violate it from the very beginning.

I insert here an extract from his testimony, which proves this proposition completely:

[Hearings on May 10, 1906.]

Mr. SULLIVAN. Did they not advise you that the construction of that law required you to build a building to take care of the administrative forces as well as the laboratories and the library?

Secretary WILSON. No; they did not talk along that line at all. I never had any such advice from them. But as regards the administrative feature, the administrators can go into the building now erected just as well as any other proposed occupants of the building.

Mr. SULLIVAN. If they do, what will you do with the laboratories?

Secretary WILSON. We will put the dangerous laboratories at one end and the library and the offices that have women, and so forth, at the other end. There will be plenty of room there for administrators; plenty of it.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Do you mean this, that you could take this building which you are constructing and so arrange matters that it would take care of the entire force of your Department?

Secretary WILSON. If I am not required to pull down the present old building, if the library is taken out of the building it occupies at present, we can use that and the brick building that accommodates the three bureaus.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Do you not understand that the act requires you to pull down those three buildings?

Secretary WILSON. Yes; but we have a growth.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Did not the act require you to arrange matters so that you would not have to pay any more rent?

Secretary WILSON. At that time, certainly; and if the Department had not grown we would not have had to pay more rent.

Mr. SULLIVAN. In consequence of that the act will have to be violated in at least two particulars?

Secretary WILSON. Yes; it is an act impossible of execution in view of the requirements of the present date. That is what the fact is. If I could have foreseen that the Department would have grown as rapidly as it has grown, I certainly would have come back to Congress and said: "Gentlemen, I can not meet the requirements of that act at all." But, estimating the number of feet we are getting with an expenditure of $1,500,000, we could accommodate the force we had at the time the act was passed.

Mr. SULLIVAN. If the Department head is authorized to construe an act for the authorization of a public building with reference to its present needs alone, is there any safety for Congress at the hands of an administrative officer?

Secretary WILSON. Do these other people do other than make a complete building? I had that in mind, pardon me, and arranged it so that Congress could without expense add to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can fancy the Secretary of Agriculture gleefully chuckling when, later, Congress appropriates another million or two to execute the plan which he, and not Congress, had in mind. Perhaps the Secretary has acted wisely and perhaps the plan of Congress was a foolish one; but I deny the right of the head of an Executive Department to say to Congress: "The law which you have enacted is unwise, impracticable, unwarrantable, and therefore I shall be a law unto myself." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in this denunciation of the Secretary——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Let us have the question and not a speech, if you please.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to know whether this Congress did not last year make an appropriation to continue the construction of these very buildings he is now condemning?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the Congress did, and the committee recommends it this year, and another committee will recommend it next year, and the Secretary of Agriculture knew that they would be obliged by the logic of events to execute his plan and not the plan of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The committee felt that inasmuch as contracts had been awarded for the entire amount authorized by law, less the trifling amount of $7,000, it would be a great hardship upon the contractors, who had dealt with the Secretary in good faith, to refuse to appropriate sufficient money to carry on the work in the next fiscal year, and that it would be an additional hardship upon the taxpayers of the nation to leave an unfinished and consequently valueless structure upon their hands.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If you will extend my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. You stated that the present bill carried the appropriation just as it was in the current law.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I was mistaken about that, for the money is given, though the language is changed. If it had been carried with the same language as last year, it would have given an implied sanction by the committee of the legality of the Secretary's procedure. The committee refused that sanction and deliberately changed the language of the appropriation, simply carrying the amount requested by the Secretary. There is not a member of the committee who considered the question who entertains the slightest doubt of the illegality of the Secretary's procedure from the very beginning.

Now, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Secretary has acted wisely, as I have said, but is that the question for Congress? He is a member of this Republican Administration, he is a member of the President's official family. Whether he has had the sanction of the President in his violation of the law I am not prepared to state, for I do not know, and I believe that the Secretary is too loyal to his chief to tell the truth if the President has sanctioned that violation of the law. At all events the fact remains that a law of Congress has been deliberately violated by a Department head, and the question now is, What do you gentlemen of the majority, who are charged with the responsibility for legislation, propose to do with this executive officer who deliberately and contemptuously flouts the solemn mandate of Congress? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the President was not aware of this violation of law before, he is aware of it now. If he fails to call for the Secretary's resignation it will be because he advised this violation and does not dare to remove him. On the other hand, if he did not know of it before, he does now, and if he fails to call for his resignation it is because he himself has contempt for Congress and its laws, and therefore upholds a member of his official family who expresses that contempt for Congress and its laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The third violation is not without an extenuating feature. It has at least the merit of being frankly acknowledged by the officer in question. Mr. Commissioner of Immigration Sargent, who is a plain, blunt, honest man, and scorns all subterfuge, told us that he was violating the Chinese-exclusion law. So that there may be no misapprehension of his statement or its effect, I will read briefly from his testimony before the committee.

The chairman asked him if his estimates for the enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion law did not carry $100,000 less than in the previous year.

He replied that it did. Upon being questioned as to the reason for the decrease, he made the statement that the Chinese-exclusion law was not being enforced at the present time, and that it was the intention of this Administration not to enforce it. This is his statement:

As you will see, February shows a good deal less expenditure in 1906, as compared with 1905, because we are returning few Chinese to China.

Question. That is, they are not violating the law as much as before?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; we were instructed not to make arrests of the Chinese found unlawfully in this country.

Question. The law is not enforced so rigidly?

Mr. SARGENT. We are not doing so active a business as we were a few months ago.

Question. From whom did you receive the instructions not to enforce the law?

Now, mark the answer:

Mr. SARGENT. I received the instructions from the head of my Department, the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor. He said that during this agitation about the boycott in China he thought it would be unwise to make the arrests, as we had been previously doing, of Chinamen found unlawfully in this country, and of course I always obey instructions. We were expected under the law to take into custody those who had been here unlawfully, and that was what I was doing.

Now, the money spent and estimated to be spent for the fiscal year 1906 is $134,000 less than the preceding year, and this $134,000 does not adequately express the proposed laxity in the enforcement of the law, for Mr. Sargent made it plain by his testimony that all they were doing was maintaining the force without keeping that force busy in their duties. He made this statement:

Comparing the month of February, 1905, with February, 1906, our expenditures were in the former $62,609 and in the later $28,683. Now, in February, 1905, we had a large deportation, while now we are deporting scarcely any, so that our expenditures at the present moment are what might be termed merely the running expenses, maintaining the service, paying the salaries and incidental expenses of the Chinese service, with very few returning to China, for which, of course, the larger amount of the fund is used.

Now, gentlemen, what folly it is to maintain such a law upon the statute books if the administrative officers of the Government are determined not to enforce it. What folly it is to expend nearly $400,000 for the maintenance of this branch of the service, when the head of the Department solemnly informs Congress that he has received instructions, which he intends to obey, that he shall not deport another Chinaman, that he shall not execute the law which the money is to be appropriated for.

I do not undertake to say here whether this law is a wise one or an unwise one. That is not a question for the executive branch nor for the judicial branch, but solely a question for the legislative branch of the Government. If Congress believes the Chinese-exclusion law ought to be repealed, then let Congress in its dignity repeal the law and save the people's money. But if Congress believes that the law ought to be executed as all laws ought to be executed, according to their intent, then let us insist that the money shall be spent, not in the maintenance of a useless bureau, but in the most diligent execution of that law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Three minutes will be sufficient. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is material to inquire the reason for this violation of the law. The fact is that it was violated. We all remember that there was a boycott in China upon American goods, and great pressure was brought to bear on the President and the officers of his Cabinet to relax the law so as to increase the exports of American goods to China.

I know that manufacturers from my section of the country clamored for a restoration of the conditions which would maintain unimpaired the volume of exports of textiles to China. I know that later the Department of Commerce and Labor ceased to execute the Chinese deportation law. I do not know whether the failure to execute the law was the result of a bargain between the President of the United States and the Chinese ambassador, but I know that the boycott existed in China and the boycott has ceased; that the exclusion law here was being enforced and that the law now is not being enforced. Whether these are merely coincidences totally unrelated to each other is a question I leave to the judgment of the House. But the House ought not, if a bargain was made, to ratify such a bargain by leaving unpunished an executive officer of the Government—the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor—who has willfully violated a law enacted by this body. Now, nothing has become more familiar to us than that ours is a government of laws and not of men. If we are to maintain a government of laws, we must stand vigilantly by the laws, or else a government of men will succeed and a despotism will ensue.

To prevent a government of laws from lapsing into a government of men unrestrained by law, it is necessary to exert constant vigilance. If some infractions of the law are allowed to go unpunished, a contempt for all laws will be bred that will eventually subvert the Government itself. This subversion is inevitable if violations of law are continued, whether they are committed by persons in humble walks of life or by those higher in the scale of society. Swiftly and certainly will that government proceed toward ruin wherein those appointed to execute the laws are themselves guilty of its violation. It is therefore in the interest of good government to call attention to a public official's neglect of a duty imposed by law to the end that even though the law's penalty be not visited upon him because of the indulgence of his party associates who enjoy political power, yet the force of public opinion will restrain him from similar breaches in the future.

The Secretary of Agriculture must not say to Congress, "Your law is folly, and therefore I shall do as I please, regardless of the law." The Secretary of the Interior must not say, "Your method of rendering accounts provided by the Constitution and the laws is not a practicable one, and therefore I shall deposit the money and account for it as I please." The Secretary of Commerce and Labor must not say, "The enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion law means the diminution of exports of cotton goods to China, and as trade is superior to law I will violate the law and restore the trade." Above all, the President of the United States, who is sworn to execute all the laws of Congress, ought not to remain idle now that these deliberate violations of the law by members of his own Cabinet are thus formally and publicly called to his attention. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRUNDIDGE rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just one word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated at the outset of his speech that the purpose of closing debate was because the Republican side of the House feared the effect of a speech which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was to make in general debate. I presume this speech was to be upon the now famous subject of watches. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] magnifies the importance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. There is nobody on this side, either individually or collectively, who are quaking in their boots for fear of any speech that the gentleman from Illinois might make. We have withstood one speech from that gentleman of three hours on the subject of watches, and, notwithstanding the strain, we are capable of enduring a similar affliction. There was no secret meeting anywhere last night, or at any other time, as he claims, to prevent him from making a speech. I want to say also that in attempting to close general debate I have had to deny a request for time to a gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] on this side of the House, who requested three hours' time to discuss the subject which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has heretofore discussed, namely, the subject of timepieces.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make that motion just now, in view of the fact that this is a record bill, and also of the fact that as a member of the committee there are some matters in the bill which I desire to discuss. I do not want to discuss it under the five-minute rule, because I will not have the time. I will say to the gentleman now——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that when the item in which he is interested and which he desires to discuss is reached under the five-minute rule, he will have ample time to discuss it, even if he should desire as much as forty or fifty minutes. I know the subject to which the gentleman has reference, and the subject can be discussed when it is reached, I think, more pertinently than now. My purpose now is to get at the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule in order that we may expedite its passage through the House. There will be no attempt upon my part or upon the part of any other Members of the House, so far as I know, to prevent the gentleman from discussing the subject which he has in mind.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is anxious to get to the bill, and I have no desire to delay it, but I desire to explain to the gentleman that in all probability it will be utterly impossible for me to be in the House to-morrow.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the item which the gentleman has in mind will not be reached to-morrow, and it is doubtful whether it will be reached the day after.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has moved that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no time to yield, for if I yield the floor now, then, of course, I shall have no opportunity of further taking the floor.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for thirty minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for thirty minutes. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] objects by moving that the committee do now rise. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts and Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 196, noes 53.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 57.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the bill be now closed, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, he moves that all general debate in the committee be closed. Upon that motion the gentleman from Minnesota demands the previous question. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to withhold the previous question for a while.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question is not debatable.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to insist upon the question being taken upon my motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 140, noes 73.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 77, answered "present" 19, not voting 135, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

On this vote:

Mr. FLACK with Mr. TRIMBLE.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause for the purpose of making a request. I have stated to the champions in debate, my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]——

Mr. TAWNEY. Can not the gentleman allow the first paragraph of the bill to be read?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Clerk has read the enacting clause, and I thought a motion to strike it out would be a good motion upon which to predicate my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The first paragraph must be read before the gentleman can make the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, namely.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have spoken to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], the chairman of the committee, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] in charge of the minority and have given them the reason for my request. I desire to talk about this bill, and I expect possibly to be called away from the city after to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a motion to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he substitute a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. In view of the disastrous consequences that might result from the prevalence of the first motion I yield to the importunities of my friend and move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the other motion to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman now moves to strike out the last word, and is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes. I do not expect to take that much time, but if necessary I should like to have that long. I do not care to talk about this section of the bill, but about the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed without interruption for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, in the outset I wish to congratulate my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and his colaborers on that committee, on the spirit of economy manifested by them. This spirit of economy extends not only to money, but the chairman of the committee adopts the threadworn theory that time is money, and he economizes as to time, and he deliberately sticks a peg and limits himself to one hour, and then says, "I can not yield, because my time is limited," when he himself deliberately placed the limit which prevented him from yielding time which otherwise would have been his own.

I love economy. Especially do I love to see a sane moment on that subject among my friends on the other side of the aisle. But there is economy and there is economy. There is extravagance on one extreme and there is parsimony on the other. This great committee, Mr. Chairman, is charged with looking after the maintenance of the affairs of the Republic, only one other committee supplementing its efforts—the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which looks to the necessary communication between individuals and sections of the country. Neither of these committees is expected to raise revenue, nor starve the industries and institutions of the country through parsimoney. Every other committee of this House may more properly urge the doctrine of economy. It is always and everywhere proper to urge the doctrine of honesty and the exclusion of graft; but when it comes to the two great committees which are to dispense the household funds in such a way as to maintain the Republic, or the family, in decency and efficiency that is the time to study practicality, to study efficiency, to study how to spend money to do the most good and how to make the wheels of government revolve in efficiency and security, and the resources and conditions of the family improve.

But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

I am not denouncing my good friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but I am simply giving him warning of what may be in store for him in the way of denunciation if his committee pushes that doctrine of economy too far.

There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and, there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

What we want the great appropriation committees to do is to be honest, but to provide for the efficient management of the affairs of this Republic, and supply everything that will benefit the people.

Now, there are two or three items in this bill which I desire to mention. I have not given great care to all the provisions of the bill. My attention has been called to one in regard to printing. They propose to save money in order to make reputations for economy in a committee which ought to make reputations for efficiency and honesty only. They propose to deprive the great Departments of this Government of doing the printing which they can do conveniently, expeditiously, without trouble, which would be disastrous to the Departments of the War and the Navy, and would cause them more trouble, delay, and inconvenience than the entire amount of money expended. It is the old folly of saving at the spigot and spending at the bung.

In the Geological Survey the very first item they strike is an item for topographical surveys. This House last year, by an overwhelming majority, increased the appropriation over the amount recommended by the committee, $300,000, making it $350,000. This year the committee, forgetful of what occurred one year ago, forgetful that the House is not here to tear down the Geological Survey, but to build it up, forgetful of the increase of $50,000 last year, which ought to justify at least an increase of another $50,000 to-day, have undone the work of last year and reported the old amount of $300,000. I should like the celebrated economists on that committee to inform the House what use they think it is for us to increase by $50,000, if they are coming along in their spasm of economy and destroying the benefit by reducing the appropriation to the first amount. Any old stingireen can make a reputation for economy if he will starve himself and his family and dress and live niggardly. This is too great a country for that. We have a right, our citizens have a right to the full services of the efficient corps now organized in the Geological Survey to extend the quadrangles that have covered as yet only a portion of our country. The same difficulty occurs in four or five other divisions in these operations. The measurements of streams, which are important in a thousand ways, have been once or twice put back entirely into the bill, when the Committee on Appropriations had left it out entirely. On two occasions, when the committee reported only $100,000, we have, by tremendous majorities, increased the amount to $200,000; but the economical committee, making a reputation by starving the country, in order to save a few dollars that ought to have been saved somewhere else, cut down the amount again to $100,000.

The same is true as to the preparation of the report on mineral surveys, and as to every division in that Department. Now, I do not know whether these statesmen on that committee expect a deficit in the Treasury, and endeavoring to save it by denying necessaries to the people, had heard that the Committee on Buildings and Grounds contemplated authorizing a building for the Geological Survey and accordingly cut this down to recoup or not, but I am here to say and every official of that Department will say they would rather work out doors and continue to do this work than to be deprived of the means of advancing the interests of the people by their researches and the excellent work of this splendid corps. If they must give up one, they would prefer to give up the building. If the Committee on Appropriations can afford to straggle by and look at that eyesore of a building in which this work is being done, the servants of the public would rather work there indefinitely than lose the means of carrying on their work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another good and unanswerable reason why the items in the building should be increased. They have a magnificent force of excellent men, equipped with brains and experience and the necessary instruments to carry on all the branches of the work in the Geological Survey. It is necessary that that organization should be kept intact. If you cut the appropriations by proposed reduction to $360,000 at this time, you disband and destroy their efficient organization, and whenever the committee determines it will be economical somewhere else and that it will give this Department a chance to catch up, it will take years to reassemble and reorganize the force in its present efficiency. It is unwise, it is not economical, it is wasteful to cut down this appropriation in this way. I will not say it is a mad, a reckless waste, because I know the gentlemen of that committee are all patriots and good citizens desiring to do right. I know that what they have done has been actuated by the highest patriotism and the purest desire to make a good showing. I do not care if my good friend from Minnesota does succeed in making such a record for efficiency and wise expenditure, and not for parsimony, that if we must be afflicted in the future by Republican domination, he will have a chance to make as good a Republican Speaker as other Republicans. [Applause.] I hope amendments will be adopted undoing all this damage, and thank the committee for its attention and courtesy.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chicago, Ill., post-office and court-house: The appropriation made in the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved February 27, 1906, for improvements and changes of a general nature is hereby made available also for the interior decoration of the building.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 3 by inserting after line 4 "for repair of paving, $15,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am willing that the gentleman should make his point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will make the point of order if the gentleman desires me to.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the point of order disposed of now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that it is not authorized by existing law and is new legislation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order: The amendment is to provide $15,000 for the repair of the paving at the Federal building in Chicago. I may say to the Chair that the United States Government occupies the ground under the Federal building in Chicago by virtue of a purchase or exchange of ground and through an act of the legislature of Illinois. The act of the legislature is one which was approved March 7, 1872, and is as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to cede jurisdiction to the United States over certain land, and for the purchase and condemnation thereof," approved December 14, A. D. 1871.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of Illinois, represented in the general assembly, That "An act to cede jurisdiction to the United States over certain land, and for the purchase and condemnation thereof," approved December 14, in the year of our Lord 1871, and which was and is as follows, to wit:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of Illinois, represented in the general assembly, that the United States shall have power to purchase or condemn, in the manner prescribed by law, upon making just compensation therefor, any land in the State of Illinois required for custom-houses, arsenals, light-houses, national cemeteries, or for other purposes of the Government of the United States.

"SEC. 2. The United States may enter upon and occupy any land which may have been or may be purchased or condemned, or otherwise acquired, and shall have the right of exclusive legislation and concurrent jurisdiction, together with the State of Illinois, over such land and the structures thereon, and shall hold the same exempt from all State, county, and municipal taxation.

"SEC. 3. Whereas by the burning of the United States post-office, custom-house, and United States court rooms in the city of Chicago an emergency exists requiring this act to take effect immediately; therefore this act shall take effect from and after its passage"— be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto as follows:

"SEC. 4. That in case there shall be any street or alley running through any block or tract of land so purchased or acquired by the said United States for any of the purposes described in the said act hereinbefore set forth, all that portion of such street or alley within such block or tract of land, shall, upon the purchase of the same by the United States, or the transfer of the same to the United States by condemnation or otherwise, for any of the purposes aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, vacated and closed, and the lots or tracts of land abutting upon any such street or alley shall extend to the center line thereof, and vest in the said United States, and become the property thereof, with full right, power, and authority to use, occupy, and enjoy the same as its own property in fee, to the same extent as though the same had never been used or occupied as a street or alley; and the said act to which this is an amendment shall apply to the said portion of such street or alley so vacated to the same extent as to the block or tract of land so purchased or to be purchased or condemned for any of the purposes aforesaid."

Approved March 7, 1872.

It has been claimed that under that act of the legislature the title of the Government to the grounds extended to the center of the streets around the post-office building. In 1880, before the construction of the post-office building had ceased, the United States appropriated money for the paving of the streets. That was carried in the general deficiency appropriation bill, approved June 16, 1880, and provided, under the head of "public buildings," for the construction of the custom-house, court-house, and post-office building and approaches at Chicago, Ill., including steps, grading, sidewalks, and paving, $125,000. Under that statute the Federal Government paved the half of the streets adjoining the Federal building on all four sides of the building, covering the entire square. That, as a matter of fact, was paved with cedar blocks.

In the latter part of the eighties the Government again paved all portions of these streets with granite blocks. These pavements are practically worn out. The item which I propose is for the repairing of these pavements laid by the Government on what it is contended is Government property.

Mr. TAWNEY. When were the streets paved and how many of them were paved?

Mr. MANN. The Government has paved all the streets around the buildings twice; that is, the half next to the Federal building.

Mr. TAWNEY. When were the streets paved, and was it done under a specific appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. MANN. The first time was under a specific appropriation, under an act which I have sent to the Chairman, in the general deficiency act of 1880, expressly providing for the pavement, and under that act the streets were paved. Subsequent to that time the streets have been again repaved by the Government. I may say to the gentleman, in all frankness, that I have been endeavoring to obtain from the Architect's Office the information how and under what appropriation the pavement was put down a second time, but the Architect informs me that he finds a trace of the record, but he had not been able to examine it. I have been trying to find out, but I have the first statute here. I know, as a matter of fact, that the streets were paved a second time by the General Government.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will suggest that this is an important inquiry. Is it not true that the General Government in the case of public buildings refuses to pave the streets adjacent to the buildings?

Mr. MANN. That is rather a question on the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Is not that the general rule, that the pavements are laid at the expense of the municipality?

Mr. MANN. I think that is so, but of course that has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is possibly true that the legislature of the State of Illinois has ceded to the Federal Government the fee to the center of the streets surrounding this public building in the city of Chicago. But it is also true that that cession has been made, as it is in all cases made, with the express limitation that it shall be entirely free from all taxes, local or otherwise, and free from any burden that the local authorities might otherwise impose upon it. I want to call the attention of the Chair to another fact, that while the State of Illinois has ceded to the Federal Government the fee to the center of the street, the Government can not use that property from the edge of the street to the center for the reason that it is burdened with an easement, which easement existed at the time the property was ceded to the Federal Government, and the Government accepted the cession subject to that easement or right of public use. Now, then, having made the cession with the limitation that it is to be free from any tax or burden, as all other cessions are made by all other States for all other public-building sites, it will be seen that that is the reason why the Government of the United States does not pave the streets surrounding the public buildings, because it has been expressly exempted from that burden or obligation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state to the Chair whether or not he has there the act of the Illinois legislature making the cession.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I have read the act of the Illinois legislature under which the property was acquired. It is not a direct cession, but it covers that particular question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in respect to the fact that these streets have been heretofore paved at the expense of the Federal Government, that should have no weight whatever in the determination of this question. There are only two post-office buildings in the United States that enjoy the distinction of having had the streets around them paved by a direct appropriation from the Federal Government—one in Chicago and the other in the State of Missouri—both places represented on the Committee on Appropriations at the other end of the Capitol by distinguished Senators from those two different States. Congress has never recognized, and the Government of the United States has expressly denied, that under the cession giving title to property for building purposes that that property was chargeable with the burden or obligation of paving the streets around the public building. If that can be done legally under the rules of the House in this instance, it can be done in every other instance throughout the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am incidentally and indirectly interested in this question. My interest lies in the direction of holding the gentleman's amendment in order, but not upon the grounds that he suggests. I do not believe the fact that the Federal Government has maintained improvements about the Federal property in the city of Chicago for twenty-five or thirty years gives it any advantage over communities where the Federal Government has never maintained or improved the streets at all. There is absolutely no force, in my judgment, in that position.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not a public work or project in progress. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that from a parliamentary standpoint an appropriation for the repair of the Federal building in Chicago would have a better status than a proposition to put up a new Federal building on some vacant lot?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Most assuredly, because from the standpoint of the Government, a public building is a public object already in progress, and the streets of the city of Chicago, from the standpoint of the Federal Government and from a parliamentary viewpoint, do not constitute a public work or object already in progress.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman probably did not understand the claim I made, that the legislature of the State of Illinois had vacated this portion of the street around the Federal building, that the title to the property was vacated, so far as the public was concerned. The United States Government can close it up. It has taken possession and has closed up the sidewalks practically already.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that the title in public streets and alleys in the city of Chicago is in the city, but that must be by special statute, because I undertake to say that the doctrine is general all over this country that the public only has an easement in public thoroughfares, including streets and alleys, and that the title is in the owner of the adjacent property. In the city of Hammond—which, of course, is not just like the city of Chicago yet—there is a public building in process of construction. We would be very glad if we could find some way to get an appropriation from the Federal Treasury to build sidewalks and street pavements in front of the Federal building, but the title to the street is in the Federal Government. It bought in fee simple the lots upon which the building is being constructed, and under our law, and I think it is universal where it is not changed by special statute, the title is in the proprietor of the adjoining property. I understand that the street around the public building is likewise a public street.

Mr. MANN. I say that the act of the legislature vacated the streets to the center of the streets, and that the Government of the United States acts upon that; that it has built sidewalks; that it uses the space under the sidewalks, which similar space the city government elsewhere rents; that it has constructed large structures upon one of the sidewalks, so that practically part of them is almost impassable, and that the Government uses them for the handling of mails, and it is all just as much a part of the street as the balance.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The public uses the streets around the public square in the same manner, of course, subject to the special use by the Federal Government. They use the streets and sidewalks under the same right that they do the streets and walks around other property.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they use the inside of the public building the same way, and walk through it to get out of the sunshine.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They use the streets around it as a public thoroughfare in the same manner they do all the other streets.

Mr. MANN. That is permissive by the Government; the Government has a right to prevent it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe that a municipality or State legislature can cede a special right to a street to the Federal Government, and thereby secure immunity from street and sidewalk improvements. If it can do that, there will be several acts of cession when the legislatures meet next winter and the year after.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say this appropriation is for the repair of a street?

Mr. MANN. For the repair of pavement originally laid by the Government.

Mr. TAWNEY. For the paving of a street?

Mr. MANN. I did not say that.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the fact?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can have the item read from the Clerk's desk if he desires to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman knows what it is. I simply want to get at the fact. Will the Clerk report the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Now, I may say to the gentleman the purpose is to repair a portion of the paving now so worn out that mail wagons coming to the post-office can not take that side of the street, and can not get there in proper time, I may say to the gentleman. There is nobody in Chicago who cares about it except from a governmental standpoint, and nobody uses that portion of the street except wagons going to and from the post-office.

Mr. TAWNEY. On what street is it proposed to repair this pavement?

Mr. MANN. Clark street, Adams street, and Dearborn street.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is not the present pavement on these streets, on the portion of the street which you say the Government owns the fee, identically the same as the pavement on the opposite side of the street?

Mr. MANN. It is not.

Mr. TAWNEY. In what respect is it different?

Mr. MANN. It was laid at a different time. They are both granite-block pavements. The city has long desired to pave the street, and the city has not been able to pave the street, because in Chicago no pavements are paid for out of the general fund. It is not possible to levy an assessment and confirm it even upon the other half of the street. The original pavements were laid at different times and by different methods, I may say to the gentleman. They are not laid of the same kind of block, except both are a species of granite block.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the purpose is this: The city, as I understand the gentleman, wants to have a new pavement on the whole street on all sides of this public building?

Mr. MANN. The city wants to have a new pavement on the outside of a portion of the street, and——

Mr. TAWNEY. And this proposes——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman——

Mr. TAWNEY. That the Government build a new pavement on this side of the street——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks a question and answers it himself, of which I am not complaining; but I would not answer it the same way.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is not a repair, but a reconstruction of an old pavement——

Mr. MANN. If it is not repair, and if they can not reconstruct it, it is all right; I do not say whether they can or not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit to the gentleman from Illinois and also to his colleague this is a matter of very great importance——

Mr. MANN. It is a matter involving $15,000 out of $120,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are a great many other buildings, with all due respect to the gentleman, besides the one in Chicago, and they are all after us for pavements. In view of the fact that this is an important matter and this subject has been fully considered and discussed in previous Congresses, in which a decision of the Supreme Court was taken into consideration and had some weight with the Chair in the determination of the question at that time, I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will not consent that the matter go over until I can have an opportunity to fully examine the discussion in that Congress?

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. BOUTELL. Solely that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BOUTELL. The sole observation I wished to make was this: That in determining this point of order the Chair ought to consider the last precedent which was made on a question of this kind. In the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has that in mind, he will state to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL (continuing). There was an item for the reerection of a building. Well, of course, an original erection of a building would have been out of order on that bill. The point of order was made against the paragraph for the reerection, and the point of order was sustained. Thereupon the item was amended to read, "For the repair of the American consular building at Tahiti, Society Islands, $5,071.45," and the point of order to that item was overruled. It seems to me that that is exactly on all fours with the amendment that has been presented by my colleague from Illinois. Waiving for the present all discussion of the merits of this amendment, it seems perfectly clear to me, Mr. Chairman, that if the United States Government had assumed the right to the center of these four streets, and under that assumption had paved them, that then surely this item for repairs would now be in order. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to postponing the discussion of the merits of this proposition, but it seems to me perfectly clear that it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, in view of the situation developed here. There are a great many public buildings in the United States and a great many sites have been procured; and it appears that when the site is procured there is a cession by the State of the sidewalks and probably half of the street to the United States.

Mr. MANN. But this is not an ordinary case, I may say to the gentleman. This was an exceptional kind of legislation.

Mr. HINSHAW. I want to ask a question concerning the ordinary case. Well, now, if the sidewalks and half the street are paved, the city calls upon the adjoining property owners to construct their portion, and then calls upon the United States to construct its portion of the street adjacent to its building, and the United States Government refuses, I want to know what the practice has been about recognizing that by appropriating money?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has never been the practice of Congress to appropriate money to defray the expense of paving around public buildings. As I stated a moment ago, there are only two instances, which I mentioned; one is the city of Chicago and the other in the city of St. Louis, or in some other city in the State of Missouri.

Mr. MANN. Has it not been the practice to keep up a walk around a public building?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that is done by the Government of the United States, but not the street.

Mr. NORRIS. A little further, in answer to that question. In this particular instance there was no recognition, was there, by the Government of the right to concede in either case the demand, or to insist upon this improvement, and it was done by a direct appropriation in an appropriation bill, was it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I am not able to answer that question specifically, and it is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I ask that this matter go over, in order that I may look up and inquire into the exact status and terms of these two appropriations that have previously been made for the pavement of these streets.

Mr. MANN. I would not endeavor to or insist, if I could, on taking any advantage of my distinguished friend, the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for whose judgment I have great regard, nor take any advantage of the House, whether I be right or wrong. I am perfectly willing for all light to be thrown on the matter and perfectly willing for the matter to go over.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota agree that it may go over without prejudice?

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the matter be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that it be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the same place and have it go over without prejudice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the words "fifteen thousand," "also $10,000, or so much thereof as is needed to pay for the repair of brick pavement heretofore constructed in the streets around the Government post-office building in the city of Galesburg, Ill."

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. PRINCE. I ask unanimous consent that it go over with the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I desire to offer, an amendment exactly the same as the gentleman from Illinois offered. I ask unanimous consent that I may have until the matter is taken up again, when we return to the consideration in the same place in the bill, to offer that amendment. It is a similar one to that offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will not amendments of this character be in order when the paragraph is recurred to? I have in mind an amendment which I desire to propose, for pavement around the public building at Hammond, Ind.

Mr. TAWNEY. In my judgment, when this paragraph is recurred to later on these amendments may all be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, because you recur for a specific purpose, unanimous consent for which has been given by the committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I ask unanimous consent that when the paragraph is taken up again, I may have the right to offer an amendment providing an appropriation for paving the street in front of the public building in Hammond, Ind.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Indiana will be granted.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to add a request that the same thing may be done with reference to the public building at Macon, Ga.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask the same privilege for Atlanta.

Mr. TAWNEY. I trust members of the committee will not become hysterical about this matter. If this delay is going to precipitate a discussion of questions of order in respect to all the amendments, I realize that it would be advisable to have the ruling of the Chair now, one way or the other, and dispose of these several amendments on points of order or on their merits. That will end the whole thing. I do not like this idea of going into a promiscuous consideration of amendments that are not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sees no difficulty in the proposition.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. Unanimous consent of the committee has been given to this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and also to the amendment offered by me in writing, and I do not see how we can do anything else than go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that all members of the committee may have the right to prepare and offer similar amendments at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MANN. What is the order?

The CHAIRMAN. That all gentlemen, when we recur in future to this section, may have the opportunity to offer amendments similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Unless that request is modified, so as to confine it to the items in the bill, I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. To the items in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Yes; in relation to the buildings named in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Public buildings mentioned in the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, certainly. They all have to be there. They are all subject to a point of order, and if they do not relate to the bill, then they are subject to the point of order on the ground that they are not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request as modified will be ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Macon, Ga., court-house, post-office, etc.: For continuation of extension under present limit, $100,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is the place where I want to offer my amendment, similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman offer it and have it pending?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I will. I have it here.

For pavement around the United States Government building and lot at Macon, Ga., $2,000.

I just offer that to have it pending. I ask unanimous consent that it may be so considered.

Mr. TAWNEY. I shall make no objection to recurring to it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

New York, N. Y., rent of old custom-house: For rental of temporary quarters for the accommodation of certain Government officials, $130,600.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph just read by the Clerk is the same old National City Bank custom-house rental fraud, and I move to strike it out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is the same old annual scandal, the same old national disgrace, the same old hoary fraud, and I move to strike out of the bill this appropriation for $130,600 to the National City Bank for rental for the old custom-house property in the city of New York. I have made this motion every year since this nefarious transaction was consummated. Last year, on my motion, the same paragraph, the same appropriation, was stricken out of the bill, and it ought to be stricken out again this year. There is absolutely no justification for this appropriation in law or in equity.

Mr. Chairman, most of the Members of this House are familiar with the facts in connection with this scandalous matter. They remember that in 1899 Lyman J. Gage, then Secretary of the Treasury, entered into an alleged contract with the National City Bank, of the city of New York, to sell the bank the old custom-house property, situate and occupying an entire block in Wall street, for $3,265,000, about one-half the real value of the property. This National City Bank, as is well known, is the Standard Oil bank, and the chief financial agency of "The System."

The Members of this House know all about this bank and the tremendous power it wields in financial and political circles all over this country. This National City Bank is one of the principal depositories for the surplus funds of the Government, and has on deposit all the time Government moneys amounting to millions and millions of dollars, for which it does not pay the people of the United States one single dollar of interest.

Now, sir, shortly after this alleged contract of sale was entered into between the National City Bank and Lyman J. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, by which the old custom-house property was sold for $3,265,000, the bank is alleged to have paid the Government, on account of the purchase price, $3,215,000, leaving a balance due the Government of $50,000. The bank paid this money, so it is said, not directly to the Government, but indirectly, by transferring on the books of the bank the amount of $3,215,000 from one account to another account. As a matter of fact, the bank never really parted with one dollar of its money on account of the payment of part of the purchase price, and no deed from the Government to the bank has ever been executed or recorded in the city and county of New York, so that the title to this custom-house property still stands, so far as the records go, in the name of the Government, and yet the Government has been paying every year to the bank, except last year, when the appropriation was stricken out, $130,600 rental for the use, apparently, of its own property.

This custom-house property occupies one entire block in Wall street, in the city of New York, and is considered one of the most valuable pieces of property in the country. Competent real-estate experts estimate its value to-day at over $10,000,000, and the National City Bank will soon get this most desirable piece of property from the Government without practically paying one dollar for it. What a shame! What a fraud on the people!

This one-sided agreement between the Government and the bank should never have been made. The whole transaction is one of the most scandalous things in the history of the country. It is an unconscionable contract and can not be justified in law or morals. It is a fraud upon its face, and, as Mr. HEMENWAY, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said last year when this matter was before the House, if the contract had been presented to him he never would have entered into it. I understand that the present Secretary of the Treasury has practically said the same thing. All the proceedings leading up to and surrounding this transaction between Secretary Lyman J. Gage and President James Stillman, of the National City Bank, bear the earmarks of a conspiracy to defraud the Government out of its property, and the most charitably inclined from the testimony before us can not escape the conviction that it was and is a fraud upon the taxpayers of this country.

It is my opinion that if the Attorney-General were instructed to institute an action in equity to set aside this unconscionable contract on the ground of fraud the facts would sustain the proceeding and the contract would be judicially annulled and canceled. The Attorney-General ought to institute such a proceeding.

Now, sir, it further appears that it was understood and agreed between the Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, and the officials of the National City Bank that $50,000 of the purchase price should be retained by the bank and that the deed for the property should not pass or be recorded, in order that the bank should escape the payment of taxes to the city of New York on this most valuable piece of property. It is well known that Government property can not be taxed by a State or by a municipality. I am reliably informed by the officials of the city of New York that the taxes on this property to-day would be about $100,000 a year. The bank now escapes this taxation, and it is an injustice to the people of the city of New York, and yet the bank seeks to compel the Government to pay interest on the purchase price as a rental for the property. Think of this Standard Oil bank charging the Government interest on its own money—rent for its own property. What a farce it all is! It is one of the most outrageous and shocking things that has ever come to my notice. I do not believe that any honest man who will take the trouble to investigate the matter can possibly justify the transaction.

No Member of this House can now vote for this appropriation and ever justify his vote. [Applause.] The whole transaction is a scandalous one, a fraud on the taxpayers of the country, because it deprives them of this valuable piece of property without a dollar of compensation; and it is an outrage on the taxpayers of New York City, because it deprives them of the taxes on the property. The appropriation in the bill for this rental is an outrage and can not be justified in the face of the honest facts. I intend to get, if I can, a record vote on this steal, so that the people will know how their representatives vote on this matter.

Now, sir, I object to this appropriation of $130,600 for rent, because the alleged contract is only an agreement to sell, and no title has as yet passed from the Government to the bank, no deed has been delivered, and no deed has been recorded, and the Government should not pay an exorbitant rent for its own property. It is a fraud and a sham and you all know it. The "System" has been very slick in every phase of this deal. It gets the Government property for nothing, has the use of the people's money without interest, makes the Government pay rent, and beats the city of New York out of the taxes. What a get-rich-quick scheme—but only the "System" could do it. It is a double fraud, and every aspect of the transaction is as unjustifiable as it is unconscionable. Just see what the Standard Oil crowd, through its National City Bank, have thus far made out of this scheme without either risking or paying one cent:

In "interest" upon the $3,215,000 "paid" to the Government	$914,200
In interest upon the same sum loaned on the street for seven years by the bank, about	914,200
In profit on the property now worth fully $10,000,000	6,735,000
Total profit	8,563,400

That is frenzied finance for you with a vengeance! No wonder the "System" thrives and grows fat! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word more. I think the House understands this matter. But, sir, I say that the Attorney-General should take immediate action in this case to set aside this contract, because it can not possibly be justified in law or in morals. It is a fraudulent agreement and an unconscionable contract, and it is voidable. This appropriation for $130,600 rent ought to be stricken out of the bill this year just the same as it was last year. I now move to strike it out—all the paragraph. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not care to occupy time in discussing this matter in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from New York. This transaction has been thrashed over in the House some three or four times since I have been a Member of this House, and there has been a full and complete report made of the entire transaction, explaining in detail the transaction and justifying the contract and all that has been done under it. One of the principal questions involved was whether or not the money received from the sale of this property was public money in the sense of the recipients being compelled to deposit it in the Treasury of the United States. That question was fully discussed in Senate Document 71, Fifty-sixth Congress. The Government of the United States owned this property. It sold it, and it deposited the money received with a Government depository in the city of New York. The condition of the contract was that when the consideration for the old custom-house was fully paid, the title to the property should be transferred by the Government. That was not to occur, however, until the new custom-house was completed, and this was, in substance, the provision of the law under which the sale was made. It will be completed in the near future and occupied, probably, by the 1st of next January. The matter will then be entirely closed up. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, before whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] recently appeared and discussed the matter, making the same speech that he has made here to-day—with which we are all familiar, having heard it so frequently—have considered the matter and are prepared to state to the House more completely and fully the facts in regard to the transaction than I am, and therefore I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman when this contract was entered into?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think in 1899.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What were the conditions?

Mr. SULZER. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that the contract was entered into in August, 1899, between Mr. Stillman, of the National City Bank, and Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen are aware of the fact that we have had this matter before us several years. It seems to me every session of Congress for years we have had a great squabble about the rental of this building. My recollection is that the Government undertook to sell, and did sell, some property to a New York bank, and that the title is still in the Government, and that the bank is using the property and cheating the State of New York and the city of New York out of the taxes because it can not be taxed, although it is really owned by the bank, the legal title still being in the Government. Instead of New York getting its taxes, the bank claims, when the assessor comes around, that it is Federal property and can not be taxed. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] if I am not right?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not see why the Government or why the Secretary of the Treasury does not go on and vest the title in the bank, so that the State of New York and the city of New York shall not be beaten out of the taxes and its right to levy tax on this valuable piece of property. I will ask the gentleman from New York why he objects to this rent being paid? I object to it also, but I would like to hear from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. I will say to my friend that I object to the payment of this rent because I insist that the title to the property still remains in the Government, and that no rent should be paid until the Government gives the bank a deed and the deed is recorded, so that the title is in the bank.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why hasn't that been done?

Mr. SULZER. I tried to find out and I could not. I put in a resolution of inquiry early this session, which passed this House, asking the Secretary of the Treasury what he did with the deed—where it was—and the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the House a communication saying that no deed had ever been executed. There is no deed—and there is the shame of it all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much money has been paid by the bank to the Government?

Mr. SULZER. The bank, a national depository, has transferred on its books from one account to another account $3,215,000 of the purchase price, leaving a balance due the Government, on account of the purchase price, of $50,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why doesn't the bank pay the $50,000?

Mr. SULZER. Because the bank wants to deprive the city of New York of the taxes, and it has been doing it for seven years. The taxes on this property amount to over $100,000 a year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, the former Members of this House, I know, are just as familiar as I am with the history of this matter. Here Congress is, with these facts before us for years, absolutely particeps criminis to cheating the city and State of New York out of this taxable property simply because we are drifting along here and not making the bank pay the $50,000, and the Government withholding a deed from this bank. The bank is a depository of the Government of the United States. I do not know the name of the bank.

Mr. SULZER. The National City Bank—the Standard Oil bank; the financial agency of the "system." It is a wonder—this bank.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is the simple duty of the Government to give a deed to this land, demand full payment, and take the money that has been shifted over from one ledger to another by this bank and put it in the Treasury of the United States. I understand that no money has actually been turned over to the Government and placed in the Treasury. The bank has simply taken Government deposits and paid for this land, except $50,000 yet due and not paid to avoid getting a deed and title, to avoid paying taxes. I say, gentlemen, that in all fairness there should not be any objection to demanding and collecting this balance and turning over the deed. There should be some consideration shown by Congress for the State of New York. There should be some consideration for the city of New York, and clean dealing, and, as it is, I contend and I charge that Congress has been particeps criminis in this outrageous fraud on the Government, the city of New York, and the State of New York, and in honest everyday morals and square dealing the Government of the United States, for itself and the people of New York, should compel the bank to pay this balance and give the bank a deed. As the matter stands, this bank has millions of Federal deposits—the people's money—lends it out and pays for this land, and more, the bank rents out this property to the people, and the Government of the United States, puts the rents in its coffers, and the State and city of New York is cheated out of taxing the land, all because the legal title is still, and purposely, in the United States, to avoid taxation. This is an outrage on the people I condemn most severely.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Tennessee is very much exercised over the fact that this transfer has not been made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why not?

Mr. TAWNEY. I was about to state why it has not been made. Under the act approved March 2, 1899, entitled "An act to supplement and amend an act entitled 'An act for the erection of a new custom-house in the city of New York, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1891, contains among other things the following provision:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale—to the highest bidder after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property; and in case of such sale the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and such sale shall be subject to such right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept the said purchase price in several payments from time to time as he may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made.

Now, the new custom-house will not be ready for occupation until about January 1, 1907. The full consideration for the purchase was not made because then the title to the property would have passed to the purchaser, and the Government of the United States would have been subject to the will of the owner as to its future occupancy of that property and as to the conditions of that occupancy. The Government had to continue its occupancy in order to transact its business, and could not surrender possession either under the law or because of its own necessities.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has not the Government retained possession or had a lease for a number of years on this property, and has it not now a lease on this property?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the terms and conditions of the sale which were fixed by the act which I have just now read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If we have a lease on it, how in the world can anyone take the Government's right away from the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. But we do not have a lease.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that we did.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say that we are occupying it under the terms and conditions of sale, which terms and conditions were fixed by this act which I have just now read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why does not the bank pay the balance of the purchase money?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because the Government of the United States must occupy that building until the new custom-house is completed, and until that time it can not give title to the property.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But if we have a lease on it we certainly can continue to occupy it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a few words right here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to be explaining this matter, and just about the time we got to where we would get a very intelligent idea of the situation he was broken in upon, and I would like to have him go ahead and tell us a little more.

Mr SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman what he wants to know, I think, in a few minutes. Let the gentleman content his soul in peace for just a little while longer. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and inform the House in regard to one of the most sinister features of this whole transaction. Let me read a few extracts from the letters of Mr. Stillman, the president of the National City Bank, and from Mr. Gage, then the Secretary of the Treasury. These letters are contained in Senate Document No. 71, which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has in his hand. That document is an indictment of Lyman J. Gage. It drove him out of the Treasury Department. On the 18th of August, 1899, President Stillman, of the National City Bank, wrote to Secretary Gage as follows:

We shall make the above payment of $3,215,000 upon the understanding, of course, that we are not to be liable for any taxes upon the property so long as you remain in possession.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. SULZER. "And the balance of the $50,000 remains unpaid and the deed undelivered." Yes; that is the milk in the cocoanut—a conspiracy to defraud New York City out of its taxes and the Government out of its property. Only the "System" could get away with it.

Now let me read a little more. In answer to that letter, Secretary Gage, on August 21, 1899, wrote to President James Stillman a letter, of which this is an extract:

As to the taxes against said property, you are advised that the Department's understanding of this matter is just the same as yours, and that until we deliver you the deed you will not have to pay the taxes to the city of New York.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Whose language is that?

Mr. SULZER. Secretary Gage's.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Secretary Gage's?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. Now, on the 12th of September, 1899, President Stillman wrote to Secretary Gage as follows:

I am writing to you personally, as I desire to avoid all publicity of the contents of this letter, as the reporters seem to have access to everything that goes upon the files in connection with this custom-house matter.

Personally, indeed! Secrecy all along the line. No reporters wanted; no publicity, you see; all secrecy; all a damnable conspiracy between Gage and Stillman to defraud.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts in the case, which are well known to the newspapers of the country, and well known to most of the Members of this House who were here during those days, are to the effect that Secretary Gage sent for Mr. Stillman, and Mr. Stillman came to Washington and went to the Treasury Department, and Mr. Gage there told Mr. Stillman how much to bid for this property to get it. Mr. Stillman thereupon made the bid and the National City Bank got this property for about one-half of what it was actually worth. That was a fraud upon the taxpayers of the country. Then Mr. Gage entered into this nefarious contract of sale by which the National City Bank should practically get this property for nothing and compel the Government to pay rental for it—that was more fraud—and, furthermore, to cheat the taxpayers of the city of New York out of the taxes. That was more fraud.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the tax value of that property?

Mr. SULZER. The value of the property is now about $10,000,000, and the tax about $100,000 a year. Now, here is an editorial in the New York World, an independent newspaper, which says that the National City Bank has already made over $8,000,000 on this property deal. For rentals it has received $914,200; for interest on the amount of money deposited with it in this matter it has made at least $918,200, and as a profit on the increased value of the property $6,725,000, making a clean net profit thus far on the deal of over $8,000,000, which has come out of the taxpayers and gone into the capacious pockets of the system.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Members of this House in all fairness and in all honesty and ask, Do you want to vote any more of the taxpayers' money to the Standard Oil System? If you do, vote to keep this appropriation in the bill, and if you do not, stand by the House last year and vote out again this uncalled for appropriation of $130,600. It is unjust and dishonest, and ought not to be paid to the bank. No honest man can read the record of the transaction and then conscientiously vote for this appropriation. [Loud applause.]

But more; this was a good contract for the "System," and the "System" takes good care of its own. So let us see what it did for Mr. Gage and his assistant, Mr. Vanderlip. Well, after this contract of sale was made, after this bargain was consummated, Mr. Gage resigned as Secretary of the Treasury and went over to New York, and the "System" gave him $50,000 a year as president of one of its trust companies; and his assistant, Mr. Vanderlip, who was then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and familiar with all the details of this matter, because he has testified to it, and I have some of his testimony here in my hand, he, too, resigned and went over to the city of New York and the "System" made him vice-president of the National City Bank, at a salary, so I am informed, of $25,000 a year, and he is still vice-president of the bank. So they fared pretty well at the expense of the people, and it is——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the facts in this case——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move to strike out the last word?

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last two words, if necessary. I know nothing about the facts in this case, because I have listened to a number of speeches during a series of years on both sides of the question, and my mind would be so confused on the subject that I could not express any opinion, but I do know Mr. Gage, who was Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman from New York, I take it, would not reflect either upon his intelligence or upon his integrity. He was for many years the cashier and afterwards the president of the First National Bank of Chicago, and no citizen of Chicago, with knowledge or experience in that city, would hesitate to say that the First National Bank of that city had been conducted during all of its life upon grounds broad, liberal, and fully sustained by honest dealings, and if the gentleman from New York relies for his position upon attack upon Secretary Gage I would say that I would much rather trust the reputation and the knowledge of the dealings of Mr. Gage for honesty and fair dealing than the gentleman's opinions, whatever his opinions may be founded upon. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Gage, as a man, as a bank officer, and as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States never for a moment transcended the line of honest dealings, of absolute integrity, of fidelity to duty, both to himself and to the country. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would rather take that fact in behalf of this transaction—if it be true that it came under his personal knowledge and his personal consent—I would take that fact on the one side as outweighing all of the charges which the gentleman from New York indulges in in the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is a subject or the occasion for any vituperation, or any eulogy, either. Certainly, if Mr. Gage has nothing under the sun to entitle him to a eulogy except his part in this transaction, he is entitled to no eulogy at all from any man who possesses at one and the same time honesty and intelligence. He may be entitled to eulogy for other things, but certainly not for this. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says that he "has heard all this thing three or four times." Yes; and I have heard it three or four times; and every time I have heard it there is, to my mind, less and less ethical or honest excuse for this appropriation—less and less reason, reason specifically, can be given from one sensible man to another for continuing this appropriation under these circumstances. So thoroughly did the House hear it all the last time it was up that the House voted this appropriation out of the bill, and it was done by a Republican vote, without which it could not have been done; and it was done by them because they thought it was dishonest and wrong to keep it in.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that he has never understood this transaction. If not then it must have been because the gentleman did not go back and read the contract and the testimony as to what the transaction is. Let us just take a barefaced view of it for a moment without looking at its bearing upon any man at all. The United States Government sells a piece of property belonging to the Government for $3,500,000. After it sells it it gets paid by allowing the money to lie in the hands of the purchaser without interest. It is a fact that the purchaser, the landlord of the property and the depositee happens to be exactly the same person—the National City Bank. Moreover, while landlord, so far as to receive rent this bank is not landlord enough to pay taxes. The title is in us—the United States. The United States Government then enters into a contract that the title is not to pass until all the money is paid.

This bank then transfers upon its books to the credit of the United States Government in course of time all of the money due for the purchase except $50,000. The Government permits it to keep the money by making it a Government depository. All the purchase money except $50,000 is thus transferred and deposited. This is a rare bookkeeping. And we are told that Secretary Gage was a rare business man. I will wager he never would have entered into just this transaction if he, instead of the Government, had been the original owner of the Government depository. The $50,000 is not transferred and deposited, because that would pass title, call for a deed to be recorded, and thus subject the City National Bank to taxation—State and municipal. Now, it would be just as easy for it to transfer that $50,000 on its books as it was to transfer three millions and more, but it does not do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me conclude this statement and then I will. These are part of the facts. The next salient fact is that this money is left upon deposit in the City National Bank, which does not pay one dollar of interest. Two per cent interest upon this amount of money would amount to nearly $70,000 a year. This has been going on either seven or nine years—I have forgotten now which.

Several MEMBERS. Seven years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Seven years. Seven times $70,000 would be $490,000 of this loss to the Federal Government of interest on its money, which is at least half, more than half, of the rental that the Government has paid per year during the entire time. The bank, we may safely say, has used the money at a profit of 6 per cent, which would amount to $200,000 per year, in round numbers. Now, then, if the Secretary and these parties had wanted to do something that was equitable and right, this might have been done; it might have been possible to defend the paying to these people of $130,600 a year as rent, if during that time they had paid the Government $70,000 a year as interest.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman now permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. You have now proceeded so far beyond the point I wished to interrupt you that I will have to restate what I understood you to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am trying to make a consecutive statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman stated that this purchase was made in a private manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not state that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I made no such statement.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or at least a private arrangement between the United States and the National City Bank. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows the circumstances under which this purchase was made?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know just what the gentleman has read from, just a moment ago.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to submit this to the gentleman, in the report. I read the law. This is not the law I am reading now. I am reading what has been done by the Treasury Department under the law as shown by this document:

Pursuant to the provision of said act—

Referring to the act which I read—

Proposals for the purchase of said property (copy herewith) were solicited by public advertisement inserted, under date of June 2, 1899, in eleven of the leading newspapers published in the city of New York, a list of which said papers is shown in the certificate date August 22, 1899, inclosed herewith.

In response to said advertisement the following proposals were received:

National Bank of New York, James Stillman, President, $3,265,000.

New York Realty, Bank, Exchange, and Trust Company, Henry Morgenthau, president, $3,075,000.

Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, Edwin S. Marston, president, $3,055,000.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit me there?

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing):

The proposal of the National City Bank, having been regarded as the most advantageous to the Government, was duly accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury, in writing, under date of July 3, 1899, and a copy of said letter will be found attached to and forming a part of the contract hereinafter referred to.

Well, now I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I call for order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. The gentleman's "question," with no interrogation in it, came very near taking up my five minutes.

Mr. MANN. We will extend your time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the gentleman has read is no news to me or to the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think it corrects an impression that perhaps was erroneously created by the remarks of the gentleman in respect to the manner in which this property was disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I never created any impression that that could possibly correct.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you will allow me to answer what the gentleman has put before the House I will then yield to you. What the gentleman from Minnesota has read is this: That there was a public advertisement for the sale of the property, and that there were several bids for the purchase of the property. Nobody that I know of has ever denied that. If they had bought the property and had really paid to the Federal Government the money, if the money had gone into the Treasury, and if the title had passed to the purchaser, and if the city of New York and the State had gotten from the City National Bank the taxes from the purchase date to the present time, this question would not have been here at all.

There is nothing in connection with what the gentleman has read that has any sort of possible bearing or connection with the wrong of which we are now complaining, and this wrong is that the purchaser, the same corporation which rents to the Government and is the depositee of the purchase money without interest, are all one person; and that during the entire time we have been paying rent upon what is virtually our own property, not a dollar for it has gone into the Treasury or has been used by the Federal Government, even for the purpose of getting interest upon it, during this entire time. As I said a moment ago, there is no use in being fanatical, there is no use in being demagogical, there is no use in being eulogistic. This plain fact remains, that we sold this property for that amount of money. We have entered into an agreement whereby we rented back from the party to whom we sold it, and to whom we have delivered no title. In law, it is ours to-day. No title has passed. During that time they have paid no interest whatsoever upon the money which was due us. Now, that is all. This House, at the last session, struck this out.

The House struck it out, and it seems that the Senate agreed with the House. Both branches struck it out. The moral sense of the House was successfully appealed to against this thing. It is now put back here, not by the unanimous consent of the committee, I understand, but the Democratic members of the committee consented to its being placed in the bill merely for the purpose of allowing the House of Representatives to pass upon it, as I am informed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], a member of the committee.

One other word, Mr. Chairman. I can not conceive of any reason for continuing this, unless, perhaps, the National City Bank contributed very largely to the last Presidential campaign fund. I do not know whether it did or not.

Mr. CONNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Some time ago, I think perhaps in the early part of this session, a resolution was introduced in the House to have this matter investigated, and was referred to the Committe on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SULZER. You are mistaken about that. There was not a resolution for an investigation, but merely a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information——

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to remind Members of the committee that the only way to interrupt a speaker is to address the Chair.

Mr. CONNER. The resolution was to inquire why the Government had not made the deed that is mentioned here to-day. Now, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds took charge of that resolution, and a full investigation was had of the matters connected with the transaction of the sale of the old custom-house in New York City, and I am prepared to say that if the members of this committee will read the Senate and House reports showing an investigation of this matter, they will find they cover every phase of this question and show the transaction is as straight as a string from beginning to end; that the Government has been fairly treated; that no one has sought to take advantage of the Government, and that it has not been taken advantage of by anyone. These reports will absolutely demonstrate this fact. Our committee made a report to the House on this question, and that report is on file in the records of the House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman tell us what committee that was?

Mr. CONNER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TAWNEY. Was the report of the committee unanimous?

Mr. CONNER. The report of the committee was unanimous.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is entirely wrong about that. The committee made no report, except to report my resolution favorably. The resolution then went to the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury sent a letter to Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York has not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CONNER. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Will you please state whether the title has passed from the Government to the bank for this property in controversy?

Mr. CONNER. It has not.

Mr. PRINCE. Why has it not?

Mr. CONNER. Because under the law and the contract of sale it was not to pass until the new custom-house is completed, and it will not be completed until about the 1st of next January, as I understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNER. I have not the time to yield now. I wish to give something of the history of this transaction. This matter came up in Congress originally on the demand of the Members of Congress from the city of New York, who sought to have this arrangement entered into. They were then anxious to have a new custom-house, and it was their proposition that the old custom-house should be sold, and the act of Congress which was passed provided for its sale for not less than $4,000,000. The property was afterwards advertised for sale in many of the newspapers of New York City, and no offer was obtained. The amount of $4,000,000 could not be realized for the property. Afterwards by act of Congress permission was given to sell for not less than $3,000,000. The property was advertised again in eleven of the prominent newspapers of New York, by Mr. Gage, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning having been Secretary of the Treasury during the prior proceedings. The Democratic Congressmen from the city of New York urged that this matter be carried through.

Mr. SULZER. Who were they?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Give their names.

Mr. CONNER. Whoever they were at the time. That is the statement before our committee. The National City Bank finally bought it for $3,265,000, which was the highest offer made for the property, no other bid being within $190,000 of this offer. The transaction was closed up strictly in accordance with the act of Congress.

Mr. PRINCE. Was there anything said about the use of this property by the Government during the time that the new custom-house was being completed?

Mr. TAWNEY. The law expressly provides the manner in which that shall be done.

Mr. PRINCE. Was the Government to pay rent to the bank during that time?

Mr. CONNER. It was to pay 4 per cent on the value of the property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the contract provide that the title shall not pass, not until the new custom-house is completed, but until the entire consideration is paid to the Government?

Mr. CONNER. Both.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, it does not say both.

Mr. CONNER. Yes, both. Section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange Place, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property; and in case of such sale, the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum of the amount of the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and said sale shall be subject to this right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept the said purchase price on several payments, from time to time, as he may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made.

The Secretary in advertising for bids upon the property, stated, in accordance with the act of Congress, that no offer of less than $3,000,000 would be accepted. He further stated that the Government reserved the right to occupy said property until the new custom-house should be ready for occupancy, and the purchaser should receive as rental for the old custom-house an annual rental of 4 per cent upon the purchase price. After the acceptance of the bid of the National City Bank of New York, a contract was entered into between the Government and the bank wherein the bank was given the right to anticipate the payment of the balance of the purchase price at any time, in whole or in part, and the Government reserved the right to continue in possession of the old custom-house until the completion of the new custom-house. The National City Bank determined to exercise its option to make a larger cash payment than was required by the Department, and on the 28th of August, 1899, there was deposited to the credit of the Treasury of the United States, with the National City Bank of New York, a depository of public money, the full amount of the purchase price, except $50,000, which is now unpaid, the bank having previously deposited with the Assistant Treasurer of the United States bonds to secure the proposed increase of the public deposit by reason of the deposit of the amount of the purchase money for the custom-house property. This was done with the knowledge and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

There was no irregularity whatever in the payment of the money by the bank in the manner it was paid. The National City Bank of New York was then a lawfully constituted depository bank, and payment made to it or a deposit to the credit of the United States was in law a payment into the Treasury of the United States. The Comptroller of the Treasury, whose decision is binding upon the executive branch of the Government, holds:

That money is paid into the Treasury of the United States by being deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, here in Washington, or to his credit with an assistant treasurer, or in a designated depository.

That has been the uninterrupted and universal rule governing the accounting officers of the Government for many years. The letter of Hon. R. J. Tracewell, Comptroller of the Treasury, dated January 8, 1900, shows this to be the case. He is supported in this view by Hon. Maurice D. O'Connell, Solicitor of the Treasury, in a letter dated January 9, 1900, and also in a letter of Hon. J. F. Meline, Assistant Treasurer of the United States, of date January 6, 1900.

The fact that no deed has been made by the Government conveying the old custom-house to the bank can have no significance when attention is called to the correspondence had between the bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that the delivery in escrow of a deed was subsequently waived, and the contract which was finally executed between the United States and the bank, dated August 18, 1899, expressly provides the waiver of this requirement. The Government could not compel the bank to accept the deed until the purchase price is fully paid, and the bank has not seen fit to pay the full amount of the purchase price. If complaint is to be lodged against anyone it should be against Congress for enacting the law under which the property was sold and those who were instrumental in having the act passed, and not against the Secretaries of the Treasury who in good faith carried out the letter of the law. There is but one thing for the Government to do, and that is to faithfully comply with its contract and pay the rent according to agreement until the new custom-house is completed and possession of the old one is surrendered to the bank.

The efforts which the minority are making to create political capital out of this matter will prove futile. I predict that this is positively the last appearance of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] to insist upon a further investigation of the conduct of the representatives of the Government in connection with the sale of the old custom-house.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in January of the present year the comptroller of the city of New York, its chief financial officer, had his attention called to this very peculiar transaction, and he attempted to have levied and collected the taxes that should have been paid upon this property. He estimated that, since the Government sold the property, over $800,000 should have been paid to the city of New York in taxes. The question was referred to the law department of the city, and it was decided that because the title was in the Federal Government taxes could not be levied against the property by the city of New York. The comptroller came to Washington and called upon the present Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain why the title to this property had not been transferred to the purchaser. Mr. Shaw informed him that, in accordance with the contract, until the entire consideration was paid the deed could not be delivered.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Can the gentleman from New York tell whether under the terms of the contract this remaining $50,000 is now due?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Federal Government can get it, as I understand the contract, upon demand and a tender of the deed.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What does the gentleman say as to whether a 4 per cent gross rent is a high or a moderate rent in the city of New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For property of this character, if the owner pays the taxes, it is a fair rent; otherwise it is exorbitant.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that the very best property in New York rents for 4 per cent gross, and that the tenant pays the taxes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that the Waldorf-Astoria is rented at 4 per cent gross, and that the tenants pay all the repairs?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not familiar with the terms under which the Waldorf-Astoria was built or leased.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Does the gentleman assert that if the Government of the United States pays 4 per cent upon the actual cost of this building, and then protects the parties against the payment of the taxes, that that is more than a reasonable rent in the city of New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not follow the questions of the gentleman, which are in the nature of a speech. I want to state some of the facts that I know in connection with this matter.

If it had been known in the city of New York that such an arrangement as has been made with this bank would have been made with the purchaser in the sale of this property, the bids would have been much higher.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the amount still due on that building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would it not have been better for the city of New York to have contributed that amount as a donation and then collected the taxes during that time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the city would have made over $750,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was calling attention to what happened this year. The comptroller of the city of New York asked Mr. Shaw, the Secretary of the Treasury, why the deed was not delivered, and Mr. Shaw said it was not delivered because the full consideration had not been paid. And he said further, in effect, that he did not assume the responsibility for that contract; that he found it when he came into office.

Let me call the attention of members of this committee to the fact that this particular contract was made in the way it is evidently in order to evade the law in favor of the National City Bank. The National City Bank, under the national banking act, as I recall it, can not purchase real estate except to occupy it for banking purposes, or acquires it in the ordinary course of its business as the result of failure to take up loans as security for which the property is pledged.

Mr. REEDER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it is brief.

Mr. REEDER. Was not the contract made for the express purpose of accommodating the city of New York with a new custom-house?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all.

Mr. REEDER. Well, that is the situation; and now you gentlemen come here with a proposition to violate the contract made for the benefit of the city.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that is not the situation. The gentleman from Minnesota mentioned the bids that were made. The next bid to this, $3,265,000, was by the New York Realty Bond Company, and it was for $3,075,000. That company was ready to pay that money to the United States, and the difference between that bid and the bid of the bank is only $190,000. That bid was made in the belief that the purchaser would be liable for taxes. If that $3,075,000 had been paid to the Federal Government the city of New York would have collected $800,000 in taxes. The ingenious scheme already outlined was arranged, however, for two purposes—one to evade the payment of taxes to the city of New York, and the other to enable this bank eventually to get title to property that under the law it could not purchase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois has spoken in eulogy of the man who was at the time of this transaction Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage. I do not care to say anything in disparagement of him, but I say that this transaction will not reflect credit upon him or his career. He is to-day the president of the United States Trust Company, in the city of New York, one of the institutions controlled by the same element that owns the National City Bank.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. Gage has entirely retired from business.

Mr. SULZER. He retired only the other day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He retired within a few months. Almost as soon as he left the position of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States he took that place, and the man who was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at that time, Mr. Vanderlip, is to-day the vice-president of this National City Bank. If these facts do not make the entire transaction smack suspiciously, I would like to know what transaction in the history of the Government does have a peculiar air. Let gentlemen defend this transaction if they will. Last year we struck out and did not pay rent for this custom-house. The National City Bank will eventually make more——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment for a suggestion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago some of the gentlemen over there seemed to be under the impression that this contract held that these purchasers were to be protected from taxes, water rates, etc., as long as the United States Government occupied the property. I want to read an extract from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, to Mr. Stillman, dated August 21, 1899, that proves that it is not dependent upon the occupancy, but upon the vesting of the title, and the vesting of the title is dependent upon the payment of $50,000. Here is the language:

> As to taxes, water rates against said property, you are advised that the Department's understanding of this matter is the same as yours, to wit, that so long as the title to the property remains vested in the United States you will not be liable for taxes or water rates.

There is nothing about occupancy at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If gentlemen wish to pay this money under these circumstances, of course they will vote to do so; but I hope that the House will not set its approval upon the transaction.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman recognizes, does he not, the legal liability on the part of the Government of the United States under the contract which was made?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is no obligation upon this House to pay money in the carrying out of a contract which reeks with fraud.

Mr. TAWNEY. A contract which embodied the identical conditions of the law, and the only kind of a contract that could have been made under that law, and there is a legal liability on the part of the Government. My question is whether the gentleman would pay this money in this way or pay a judgment in the Court of Claims.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If a judgment in the Court of Claims be obtained, it can not be collected unless an appropriation be made. I for one will not vote to appropriate money for such a purpose. This whole scheme has been deliberate. The Government has been treated unfairly. The city of New York has been deprived of money it should have had. Let those who were associated and who participated in the transaction take all the glory and credit from it which they may.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, as has been before stated, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds gave this matter a thorough investigation, or at least some of them did, and I desire to submit to the House candidly and fairly, without any prejudice, without any bias of a political nature or otherwise, what I believe to be the true and exact condition which exists in the matter.

I regret that gentlemen have made an attempt to-day, as they have done several times in the past, to make political capital out of this New York custom-house affair and to besmirch the characters of officials who are not here to defend themselves, and who while in office were carrying out, as I shall show, in good faith the mandates of Congress. I confess that I went into the investigation of this subject with a prejudice against the Government and against the officials who were managing the Government affairs relative to the matter. In the last session of Congress when this item in this bill was up for consideration I voted against this appropriation. I had not fully investigated it and I listened to the clamor and wild claims that were made against our officials in the Treasury Department and came to the conclusion that something was wrong.

It was in this state of mind and with this prejudice against the Government, when the matter came before the committee of which I am a member, that I commenced the investigation. I read the laws enacted by Congress under which the different officials of the Government acted. I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where these laws were up for consideration. I read every letter and every document that passed between this bank and the Government, and I came to the conclusion that the Secretary of the Treasury and all of the other Government officials who have had anything to do with this transaction pursued a course which was absolutely honorable and which can in no way be criticised or justly found fault with. The fault, if there be one, was with Congress, and in order that the House may fully understand all of the conditions surrounding this matter I want to give the history of the transaction.

The sale of this property was first provided for by the act of March 3, 1891. In that act the minimum price was fixed at $4,000,000. This act passed the House during the second session of the Fifty-first Congress, practically by a unanimous vote.

Section 2 of the act of March 3, 1891, is as follows:

> SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public auction, or at private sale after due advertisement, to the highest bidder, but for not less than $4,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place. The proceeds of such sale, after the payment of the usual incidental expenses and commissions, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States and is hereby appropriated and made available for the purpose of constructing the new custom-house building as herein and hereby provided; and in case of such sale the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and such sale shall be subject to such right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell said custom-house property and receive the purchase price in several payments from time to time, as he may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation, and the final payment is fully made.

The Secretary of the Treasury expended $2,308.05 in advertising for bids under that law. He never got a bid. He made some other investigation and some other attempt to bring this about, but he could not get a bid because the price was fixed by the law at too high a figure. As I look at it—and I am trying to look at it in a fair and honest way—there is no politics in it whatever. This law was in force from March 3, 1891, to March 2, 1899—eight years—and all that time officials were trying to sell this property. During half of this time there was a Democrat in the President's chair, and it was a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury who was trying his best to make this sale. He no doubt did his best and acted in good faith. He made a report on the 30th day of March, 1896, in regard to several things, in answer to some resolution of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and in this report he had this to say about that act and about this particular property, that on December 9, 1891, the Department advertised in the newspapers of New York City for proposals for the purchase of the present custom-house premises; and I shall insert in my remarks a copy of the advertisement and a certificate showing in what papers it was published.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for a question. I have only a very short time, and I want to get through with the matter.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, I want to be informed so as to vote intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield for a question, if the gentleman will ask it quickly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman has intimated that he will print in the RECORD that which he does not now propose to read. I wish to ask the gentleman——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, if the House will give me the time I will be very glad to read it now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to know whether the advertisement at all indicated in any way that the purchaser could keep the purchase money without paying any interest for it.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I would have to read the advertisement in order to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, I want to know what the advertisement is in order to vote fairly and intelligently upon the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I will read the advertisement, and then the gentleman can judge for himself. I will say to the gentleman that I have not the advertisement here under the first law. It is the advertisement under the second law and under which the sale was made that I have. But I was just coming to the statement——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What I want to get at is the advertisement under which bids were submitted, if bids were submitted at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am going to read that, but that is under a different law.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon me——

Mr. NORRIS. If I can get the time I do not care. Let the gentleman ask his question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me go on first and then let the gentleman ask his question afterwards.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That will be all right if the gentleman does not take up the whole of the five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I was about to read what the Acting Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Cleveland had stated.

On the 30th day of March, 1896, in the document referred to, and which I was about to read when the gentleman from New York interrupted me, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Cleveland used the following language in reference to the sale of this property under the act of March 3, 1891:

The Department advertised in the newspapers of New York City for proposals for the purchase of the present custom-house premises, but no proposals were received in response to such advertisement. Subsequent efforts were made by the Department to effect the sale of the property, but without success, for the reason that no proposals could be obtained to purchase said property at the upset price of $4,000,000.

From this it will be seen that efforts were made by both the Republican and Democratic Adminstrations to effect a sale of this property for the price named and under the conditions mentioned in the law. It seemed to be impossible to sell the property for $4,000,000, and that seemed to be the opinion of the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury after he had done his best to comply with the law and sell the property.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NORRIS. Will you let me go on?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will you answer the inquiry?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to yield now; I will answer the question later.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will you yield at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, then, they were unable to sell the property. The testimony and the correspondence show they went to New York City, both a Republican Administration and the Democratic Administration, and spent nearly $3,000 and they never were able to receive a bid. They all agreed that the price was too high, and it must be put down if it was to be sold. Under these circumstances the act of March 2, 1899, was passed. This was in the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session. It passed the House on the 28th day of February, 1899, and the gentleman from New York who has made the motion to strike out this paragraph was in the House—was a Member of this House at that time. He was here that day, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day will show. That law was passed without a dissenting voice, in which the upset price was fixed at $3,000,000. Section 4 of that act reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale, to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after the payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the United States Treasury as miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property; and in case of such sale the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and such sale shall be subject to such right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept the said purchase price in several payments, from time to time, as he may deem most advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made.

Mr. SULZER. The act reads "Not less than $3,000,000."

Mr. NORRIS. "The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell," etc., "at public or private sale," and so on, "after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the property," describing it and stating how it is bounded, etc.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I have the floor; let me manage my own speech, will you not?—and then you can get in afterwards.

And in case of such sale—

That is, for $3,000,000 or over—the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum of the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and said sale shall be subject to such right of lease; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept the said purchase price in several payments, from time to time, as may be deemed advantageous: Provided, however, That the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is made.

Now, there are two things—the custom-house must be finished and final payment must be made before he is authorized to give possession. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the day that that law was passed, as I have said, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] was present. There was not even a roll call; there was no objection. Every Member from New York was anxious to get the act passed and everybody in the House was honest in the conviction that it was a right law. Nobody knew how much property was going to advance in value. No one knew what future conditions were going to be; but I submit to you, gentlemen, that if anybody was to blame it was the Congress of the United States that passed that law. In accordance with that law the Secretary of the Treasury advertised for bids——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask, Mr. Chairman, permission to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving my right to object, I want to say to the gentleman now that I asked for the last five minutes for him that he might reply to a question. He took the five minutes—took it because of the graciousness of this House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to yield to the gentleman, but I want to finish this statement before I do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly refrain until the Chair states the question? The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving my right to object, I ask the gentleman from Nebraska—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If the gentleman says he will yield, I will not object.

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not yield this minute.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to be treated fairly on this floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I intend to yield to the gentleman, but I desire to finish this particular statement before doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Under the statement made by the gentleman, I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, under that law these advertisements were made, and these bids were submitted, and the bid of this particular bank was accepted, which was $265,000 above the upset price. This sale was made, and the correspondence back and forth between the Secretary of the Treasury and the parties is contained in House document 264, which shows that this bank at one stage of the proceedings desired to pay off the entire debt and get the deed and possession, but the Secretary of the Treasury refused to do it, because the law—this law which Congress passed, and which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] voted for—required him to retain possession of this property until the new custom-house was completed. Now, I yield to the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want the gentleman from Nebraska to answer this committee whether in any advertisement issued by the Treasury Department there was anything to indicate that the purchaser might retain without interest the purchase price, that the deed might not be put upon record, so that taxes could not be levied and collected?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, now, I will answer the gentleman's question by reading the advertisement, which will be a complete answer; but before doing that I want to submit an observation on this question of taxes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Read the advertisement.

Mr. NORRIS. Gentlemen complain that the State of New York is not getting any taxes on this property. If it be true that under the laws of the State of New York the equity in this property owned by the bank is not taxable, then it is the fault of the laws of the State, and no complaint can justly be made against the Secretary of the Treasury on that account. It is true that in one of the letters written by the bank after the sale was made and while they were negotiating about the contract, the bank officials expressed the opinion that this property would not be taxable until the deed was passed and possession given. In answer to this letter, the Secretary of the Treasury agreed with this opinion. It was, however, a subject not in any way connected with the matter in hand—something that had no legal effect in any way; an opinion expressed on a subject that was not up for consideration and that had never been taken into consideration in any way whatever. The Secretary of the Treasury, representing the United States Government, and following not only the instructions, but the mandates of the law, was trying to sell the property, and in good faith he was doing everything he could to secure the largest price. The question of taxes was one in which the Government was not in any way interested, one that was not in any way considered in the passage of the law or considered or even thought of by the officials in carrying out the mandates of law. Whether the Secretary's opinion was right or wrong in regard to the taxability of this property was absolutely immaterial, and had nothing whatever to do with the case The gentlemen who are complaining about this bank not paying its taxes to the State of New York ought to make their appeals to the legislature of that State, where laws should be enacted that would make taxable equities in property of this kind. I have given no attention to the question as to whether or not, as a matter of law, this property is taxable in its present status, because it has nothing whatever to do with the question before Congress. It is a matter entirely with the State of New York, and I can only say that if the laws of that State are so lax as to permit property of this kind to escape taxation, it is a subject that might well merit the consideration of the New York lawmakers.

Now, this advertisement was published in eleven newspapers.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What paper was it in?

Mr. NORRIS. I will give them to you, but I will have to look at another place to get it. Now, here is a copy of the advertisement:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 1, 1899.

Sealed proposals will be received at the Treasury Department, Washington, D. C., until 2 o'clock p. m. July 3, 1899, and then opened publicly, for the purchase of the custom-house property, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, New York City. No offer less than $3,000,000 will be considered. Each proposal must be accompanied by a certified check for $150,000. The Government reserves the right to occupy said property until the new custom-house on Bowling Green is ready for occupancy, and as rent for such use the purchaser will receive interest on the purchase price at 4 per cent per annum. The cash payment must not be less than $750,000. Bidders must state their wishes as to the manner of making the deferred payments, the arrangement of which rests with the Treasury Department, deferred payments to bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable semiannually. The right is reserved to reject any or all bids, or to waive any defect or informality in any bid should it be deemed in the interest of the Government to do so.

For further information apply to the collector of customs, New York City.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary of the Treasury.

"Deferred payments to bear interest at 4 per cent." That is better than cash.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the date of that advertisement?

Mr. NORRIS. I read the date; it was June 1, 1899. Now, I will read the certificate that shows how that was advertised:

Treasury Department——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless some gentleman objects, I will print that in my remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Read it. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Just put it in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the gentleman read it. It does not prove what he says.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the gentleman's time. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS (reading)—

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1899.

This is to certify that in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, entitled "An act to supplement and amend an act entitled 'An act for the erection of a new custom-house in the city of New York, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," the custom-house property in New York City, bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, was duly advertised for sale in the following-named newspapers published in said city for the periods set opposite each paper:

Mail and Express, Zeitung, Press, Wall Street Journal, Commercial Advertiser, Herald, Times, Tribune, Sun, twice a week, four weeks, beginning June 2, 1899; Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, twice a week, three weeks, beginning June 8, 1899; World, twice a week, two weeks, beginning June 13, 1899.

And further, that in my judgment such action was in compliance with the provisions of said act of Congress in respect to the due advertisement of said property.

Witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of the Treasury Department.

[SEAL.]

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Under the advertisement the following bids were received:

National City Bank of New York, James Stillman, president	$3,265,000
New York Realty, Bond, Exchange, and Trust Company, Henry Morgenthau, president	3,075,000
Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, Edwin S. Marston, president	3,055,000

On the 3d day of July, 1890, when the bids were opened, and it was found that the National City Bank of New York, was the highest bidder for the property and had bid $265,000 above the minimum limit fixed by the law, the Secretary of the Treasury immediately accepted such bid and notified the bank by letter on the same day of such acceptance. Then followed a long correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank in regard to the details of the contract that, under the law, should be entered into between the bank and the Government. Various contracts were submitted by the bank and rejected by the Secretary of the Treasury, because they failed to comply with the law, and it was not until the 8th day of November, 1899, that the contract was finally and definitely settled and agreed upon. The letter from the bank which was sent to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, with which its bids for said property was inclosed, was dated June 30, 1899. This letter, together with the answer of the Secretary, written after he had opened the bid made by the bank and the other bids, accepting such bid, and all the other correspondence leading up to the final completion of the contract, in the order in which the same occurred, is as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 30, 1899.

SIR: Referring to the circular letter issued by you on June 1, 1899, inviting proposals for the purchase of the New York custom-house property, we now offer to purchase the said property according to the terms of your letter, and to pay for the same $3,265,000.

Inclosed please find cashier's check for $150,000.

We should prefer to pay a large portion of the purchase price in cash, the deed to be executed and held in escrow by a responsible trust company until the payment of the balance due at such time as may be arranged between us, and all details as to deferred payments to be arranged to your satisfaction.

Yours, respectfully,

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
By JAS. STILLMAN, President.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1899.

GENTLEMEN: Your proposal of June 30, 1899, to purchase the property known as the "custom-house," bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, in New York, N. Y., in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, and the terms of Department advertisement dated June 1, 1899, for the sum of $3,265,000, is hereby accepted. It is noted that you desire to pay a large proportion of the purchase price in cash, and to have the deed executed and held in escrow by a responsible trust company, all details as to deferred payments to be arranged to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Please to indicate to the Department what proportion of the purchase price you desire to pay in cash at this time, and indicate the name of the trust company with whom you desire the deed to be deposited in escrow.

The details of the arrangement under which the United States will retain the occupancy and use of the premises, in accordance with the terms of the act of Congress herein referred to, as well as all details as to the deferred payments, will be made the subject of a subsequent communication.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

The NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1899.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to Department letter of the 3d instant, accepting your offer of the 30th ultimo for the purchase of the present custom-house property in New York City, I have to request that you will favor the Department with the information asked for at your earliest convenience.

Respectfully, yours,

H. A. TAYLOR,
Assistant Secretary.

The NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, July 18, 1899.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 3d instant, I beg to request that you will send me a copy of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899.

It is suggested that the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, which is one of the oldest and most responsible trust companies in this city, will be a satisfactory company to hold the deed in escrow.

At an early day I will arrange with you respecting the amount of the additional cash payment to be made by the bank, as well as all other necessary details pertaining to the completion of the purchase.

Yours, respectfully,

JAS. STILLMAN, President.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 21, 1899.

SIR: The receipt of your communication of the 18th instant is hereby acknowledged, and in response to your request there is herewith inclosed for your information a copy of act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, entitled "An act to supplement and amend an act entitled 'An act for the erection of a new custom-house in the city of New York, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891."

Your suggestion that the deed of the old custom-house to your bank, when executed, be delivered as an escrow to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York City meets with the approval of the Department.

Respectfully, yours,

H. A. TAYLOR,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President The National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to advise you that the Department is about to consummate the purchase of a site for the new custom-house building to be erected in New York City under the provisions of the act of Congress providing therefor, and you are requested to advise the Department, without delay, as to the amount of the cash payment which the National City Bank desires to make upon the purchase of the old custom-house property.

It was understood at the time of the sale that the bank desired to make a larger payment than that required by the advertisement, and the Department is now ready to accept any amount in excess of $750,000 which you may wish to pay.

It is the desire of the Department to close this transaction without further delay, in order that the deed may be prepared and delivered in escrow to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, as suggested by you, and the contract by the Government to lease the old custom-house building during the erection of the new structure arranged in proper form.

A reply at your earliest convenience is requested.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, July 27, 1899.

Replying to your letter of yesterday, Mr. Simonson, assistant cashier of this bank, will call upon you Friday to make final arrangements.

JAMES STILLMAN, President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 29, 1899.

SIR: In compliance with the request of your Mr. Simonson, there are inclosed herewith, for your inspection, the muniments of title of the United States to the so-called "custom-house property," bounded by William, Wall, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, in the city of New York, consisting of papers as fully described on the schedule hereto attached, the receipt of which papers you will please acknowledge.

When you have completed the examination of the papers referred to, I will be pleased to have you return them to the custody of the Treasury Department, where they should remain until the title to said property is actually vested in tae National City Bank of New York, at which time, if you so desire, the papers will be transmitted to you.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, July 31, 1899.

SIR: We acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 29th instant, inclosing, for our inspection, muniments of title of the United States to the custom-house property, as more particularly described on the schedule thereto attached.

Upon completion of our examination of the papers referred to, we will be glad to return them to the custody of the Treasury Department until the title is actually vested in this bank.

Thanking you for your courtesy in the matter, we are,

Yours, respectfully,

JAS. STILLMAN, President.

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1899.

SIR: In compliance with the suggestion of your Mr. Simonson, on the occasion of his recent visit to Washington, I inclose herewith, for examination by your attorneys and for such criticism as they may see fit to submit, a copy of the proposed deed of the United States to your bank of the old custom-house property in New York City, and a draft of the essential stipulations of the contract to be entered into between the United States and your bank in reference to the matter.

The Department will be pleased to have you return the inclosures with such suggestions in reference thereto as you may deem pertinent and proper.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

NEW YORK, August 14, 1899.

SIR: Mr. James Stillman, the president of the National City Bank of New York, has referred to us your letter to him of the 1st instant, inclosing proposed contract of sale and deed.

We have somewhat changed the form of the contract of sale without making any change in its material provisions, and we now send you herewith a copy as it has been revised. The principal change in substance is the addition of a clause providing for the insurance of the building against fire, the amount of which we have left blank, but which we suppose will be at least as much as the building has been heretofore insured for.

We have also provided that the deed, which will be executed and delivered to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, shall be delivered by it to the bank upon its receiving the balance of the purchase price and a lease of the premises to the Government. This is in accordance with the usual provisions of an escrow, and protects both parties in defining the terms upon which the deed may be delivered.

There are only two material changes in the form of the deed, a copy of which, as revised by us, we inclose.

In expressing the consideration we have stated, in accordance with the usage followed in this State, the total considerations, and we have made no reference to the fact that any part of the consideration remains unpaid. The deed will not be delivered until the consideration has been paid in full, and it should therefore properly describe the consideration as of that date. The provision as to the payment of a portion now and the balance upon the delivery of the deed is contained in the contract of sale, which will, of course, be binding upon the trust company, as it will receive the deed under that instrument.

The other change in the deed is in the manner of its execution. In this respect we have combined the form of patent required by section 458 of the United States Revised Statutes with a conveyance executed by you, as Secretary, on behalf of the United States. We do this as a matter of abundant caution, inasmuch as the act of Congress under which the sale is made merely authorizes you to sell and receive the purchase price, but is silent as to the conveyance by you of the land. It is therefore possible that in the absence of an express power to convey, the general provisions of the Revised Statutes might be held to apply, as it might to be claimed that the deed should be executed by the Land Office instead of by yourself as agent. We do not ourselves think this was the intent of the act, but as the amount involved is so large and is likely to be largely increased by the improvement of the property, we desire to guard against the possibility of any such question in the future.

Yours, respectfully, SHEARMAN & STERLING.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

P. S.—We have suggested January 1, 1902, as the limit for the occupation by the Government of the old custom-house. Some definite limit should be fixed, in order to enable the bank to make its plans for improving the property.

S. & S.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 18, 1899.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the permission given us when I had the pleasure of speaking with you on the telephone to-day, this bank will transfer on its books to-morrow, August 19, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of $3,215,000, as payment on account of our purchase of the old custom-house property, for which we will issue the customary receipt. Please instruct the assistant treasurer of the United States in this city to receive and hold as security for public moneys the required amount of United States bonds.

As the check for $150,000, inclosed with our bid and now in your possession has not been used, will you kindly return it to us?

We shall make the above payment of $3,215,000 upon the understanding, of course, that we are not to be liable for any taxes or water rates upon the property so long as you remain in possession and the balance of $50,000 remains unpaid and the deed is undelivered.

We presume you are forwarding to-day the deed and contract, as the same were sent you last Wednesday.

It seems from an examination of the title that the property contains 583 square feet less than we supposed, owing to the fact that the city has used a portion of the original tract as a street, and our attorneys advise us that it has had possession so long that probably we could not regain possession of it even after a protracted litigation.

Will you please give us a formal certificate, under seal, stating what notice you gave, by advertisement or otherwise, of the sale of the custom-house property, and that in your judgment this was in compliance with the act of Congress, in respect to due advertisement.

Assuring you of our appreciation of your kind attention, I am,
Yours, very truly,

JAS. STILLMAN, President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 19, 1899.

DEAR SIR: We beg to advise having transferred to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in this bank the sum of $3,215,000, on account of the purchase by us of the old custom-house property, and have deposited with the assistant treasurer of the United States here the following United States Government bonds, which, together with the excess of bonds now held by him, will cover the above amount:

$2,000,000 United States registered 4 per cent bonds of 1907.
$450,000 United States registered 5 per cent bonds of 1904.
$400,000 United States registered 4 per cent bonds of 1907.
$250,000 United States coupon 5 per cent bonds of 1904.

We have forwarded the customary receipt to the Treasurer of the United States.

Respectfully, yours, G. S. WHITSON.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 19, 1899.

SIR: This Department is in receipt of a communication dated August 14, 1899 (copy inclosed), from your attorneys, Messrs. Shearman & Sterling, submitting to the Department a suggested form of contract of sale and conveyance to be used in connection with the sale of the old custom-house property in New York, N. Y., to the National City Bank of New York.

The only material changes suggested by your attorneys in the forms submitted to you by the Department appear to be as follows:

First. That the bank shall make the final payment of $50,000 to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company instead of to the Department. As the apparent object of this stipulation is to put the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in possession of information showing that the final payment has actually been made, and that that portion of the condition relating to the delivery of the deed from escrow has been complied with, it is suggested that that object will be as well accomplished by the deposit of the amount at the proper time with the Assistant Treasurer United States, who will issue his certificates of deposit in duplicate or triplicate, one copy of which can be presented to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company as evidence of such final payment, and the contract of sale should so provide.

Second. The stipulation as to the lease has been changed so as to limit the terms thereunder to a date not later than January 1, 1902. To this the Department suggests that it has no authority to consent, for the reason that the act of Congress authorizing the sale of this property provides in express terms that, "in case of such sale the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises from the purchaser or purchasers thereof, at a rental which shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the purchase price, for use as a custom-house until the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, upon such terms as he may deem advantageous, and such sale shall be subject to such right of lease;" also, "that the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made." It is stated by your attorneys that said date of January 1, 1902, was inserted for the purpose of enabling the bank to make its plans for improving the property. It is suggested that this can readily be accomplished by the insertion of a stipulation that this Department shall give the bank six months' notice of the time when the new custom-house will be completed and ready for occupation. In view of the foregoing the stipulation relative to the lease should be modified in conformity with these suggestions.

Third. It is stipulated in the form submitted by you, that during the occupation of the building by the United States it shall keep the same insured against loss by fire, and your attorneys suggest that the amount of such insurance ought to be at least as much as the building has been heretofore insured for. In this connection you are advised that the United States never insures its public buildings, and consequently has never had any insurance on this building; and, furthermore, that there is no appropriation under the control of this Department which could be made available for such a purpose. Consequently, if the bank desires to have this property insured it must secure the same at its own cost and expense.

As to the suggested change in the form of deed relating to the consideration, you are advised that the Department has no objection to expressing the consideration as having been paid in full, in view of the fact that the deed is not to be delivered from escrow until the total amount of the purchase price shall have been paid, and the conditions under which said deed shall have been delivered in escrow fully complied with.

In reference to the suggestion of your attorneys that, as a matter of abundant caution, the conveyance in this case should be in the form of a combined quitclaim deed and patent, because of the omission in the act of express authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to convey the property, you are advised that such form is not considered by the Department to be proper or necessary. It is a well-settled principle of law that whenever Congress confers authority upon an agent of the Government to do any act it is to be construed as including all necessary or usual or proper modes and means of accomplishing the act, since to authorize the doing of an act and at the same time to deny the proper means of doing it would be idle and absurd. (17 Opinions of Attorneys-General, 100; Story on Sales, sec. 70.) This principle has been the subject of numerous adjudications by the courts, and your attention is respectfully directed to the cases of Decker v. Freeman, 3 Greenleaf, 338; Valentine v. Piper, 22 Pick., 85, and Yale v. Eames, 1 Metc., 488.

Furthermore, it is suggested that the General Land Office has no authority to issue patents to lands other than those embraced within the public domain, and this term can not be held to apply to lands either acquired or set apart for a particular purpose of the Government, and therefore the Land Office would be without authority to act in this case and has so informally advised this Department. For these reasons it is submitted that a quitclaim deed, executed by the Secretary of the Treasury, will be ample to convey all the estate, right, title, and interest of the Government in and to the property in question.

In other respects the forms submitted by your attorneys appear to be satisfactory, and upon the receipt of a statement from you that the changes herein suggested are satisfactory to you new forms, prepared in accordance therewith, will be drawn and executed. It is requested that you favor the Department with an early reply.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President of the National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 21, 1899.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 18th instant in reference to the details of the business relating to your purchase of the old custom-house property in New York City, you are advised that when Department letters dated August 19, 1899, were prepared relative to the form of contract of sale and deed, and concerning the matter of the deposit with your bank of the sum of $3,065,000 to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States on account of the purchase of said property, your letter above referred to had not been received. The Department is now in receipt of certificate of deposit No. 1614, issued August 19, 1899, by the National City Bank of New York, showing the deposit by your bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States of the sum of $3,215,000 on account of the purchase of the old New York custom-house property. The certificate will be held awaiting determination of the question of the proper method to be employed in paying the outstanding expenses of the sale, as the amount to be deposited must be reduced by the amount of such expenses.

The subject of the return of your certified check of $150,000, deposited with your bid, will be disposed of at the same time.

As a reply to that portion of your letter of the 18th instant not covered by the two letters of the Department dated the 19th instant, you are advised that the property offered for sale by the United States is bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, and that the same will be described in the deed to you as being so bounded. The Department is not aware that the city has appropriated any part of the property for streets since its acquisition by the United States, but if you desire it at any time I will have the records of the Department examined and advise you what they show, if anything, bearing on this point.

In compliance with your request that you be given a formal certificate, under seal, showing what notice the Department gave by advertisement, or otherwise, of the sale of the old custom-house, you are advised that such a certificate will be sent you, showing that the law was complied with in regard to advertising for proposals for the purchase of said property.

As to the taxes and water rates against said property, you are advised that the Department's understanding of this matter is the same as your own, viz, that so long as the title to the property remains vested in the United States you will not be liable for any taxes or water rates.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES STILLMAN,
President of the National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 24, 1899.

SIR: We have to acknowledge the receipt of your two favors of the 19th instant and that of the 21st instant, in relation to the old custom-house property in this city.

Mr. John A. Garver, of the firm of Messrs. Shearman & Sterling, the attorneys who represent us in this business, leaves to-night for Washington in order to carry out the suggestions contained in your letters referred to above.

Yours, respectfully,
JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 24, 1899.

DEAR SIR: This will introduce to you Mr. John A. Garver, of Shearman & Sterling, the legal representatives of this bank in connection with the matter of the purchase by us of the old custom-house property in this city.

In any way you can expedite the closing of the matter, you will confer upon us a favor.

Bespeaking for him your courtesy, we are,

Respectfully, yours,
W. A. SIMONSON.

The SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 28, 1899.

SIR: We acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 26th instant, inclosing our cashier's check for $150,000, placed on deposit with you to secure our bid for the New York custom-house property.

We have followed your instructions by canceling the certificate of deposit issued by us for $3,215,000 (returned to us in your letter of the 24th) in favor of the Treasurer of the United States, and now send you herewith original certificate No. 1622 for $3,065,000, and No. 1623 for $145,000, together with our check for $5,000 to your order, making a total payment on the property of $3,215,000.

Will you kindly acknowledge receipt of this, and oblige,

Yours, very respectfully,
G. S. WHITSON, Cashier.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, September 12, 1899.

SIR: On the 1st instant an official letter was written you acknowledging the receipt of yours of the 31st ultimo, and stating that the subject-matter had been referred to the counsel of the bank. They have examined the proposed quadruplicate contracts and deeds and approve of the adoption of the various suggestions, except the insertion in two places in the contract of the words "subject to appropriations to be made by Congress." If these words had been used in the act or been made a part of the terms of the Department advertisement, dated June 1, 1899, no objection would now be made to their insertion in the contract, but such was not the case.

It is immaterial to the bank what method the Department adopts for raising the money with which to pay the rent. It may be that its only method is, as suggested in your letter, through an act of Congress authorizing an appropriation for the purpose. The bank, however, does not wish to agree that any particular method shall be adopted by the Treasury Department. It relies upon the act of Congress and the Department advertisement, the former of which explicitly states that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall lease said premises * * * at a (certain) rental," and the latter, with equal explicitness, states that "as rent for such use the purchaser will receive interest on the purchase price at 4 per cent per annum." I think, therefore, that you will recognize the justice of this position and will not insist that these restrictive words be inserted, when neither the act nor the Department advertisement imposed them as a condition of the compulsory lease.

I am writing to you personally, as I desire to avoid the publicity of the contents of this letter, as the reporters seem to have access to everything that goes upon the files in connection with this matter. The delay in earlier communicating with you has been due to my absence from the city.

I am, yours, respectfully,
JAS. STILLMAN,
President.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1899.

SIR: You personal note of the 12th instant, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to the form of contract of sale to be entered into between the United States and your bank in the matter of the purchase of the old custom-house property in New York City, was duly received. In reference to the employment in said form of the words "subject to appropriations to be made by Congress," you are advised that those words were used advisedly. While the act authorizing the sale of the custom-house property authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to lease said property from the purchaser, no appropriation is made in said act, in terms, for the payment of the rent. It was therefore thought best to follow the established practice of the Department in similar cases by inserting the words in question, which it is thought do not in any way affect your right to payment. As stated in a former letter, an item for the rent in question will be included in the estimates for appropriations to be submitted to Congress. The contingency of the refusal of Congress to make such appropriation under the circumstances would seem to be exceedingly remote in view of its authority and direction to lease the property.

Respectfully,
H. A. TAYLOR, Assistant Secretary.

JAS. STILLMAN, Esq.,
President National City Bank of New York,
New York City.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, September 20, 1899.

SIR: We acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 19th instant in reference to the New York custom-house (old property), and beg to say that the same has been referred to our counsel and will have prompt attention.

Respectfully, yours,
W. A. SIMONSON,
Assistant Cashier.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, October 2, 1899.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of to-day, I beg to inclose you four copies of the agreement and deed in reference to the sale of the old custom-house property, upon which I have marked, on page 3: "Subject to appropriations to be made by Congress;" which sentence we desire, if possible, to have eliminated.

Trusting that you can see your way clear to do so, and that we may hear further from you in the matter at your convenience, we are,

Yours, very respectfully,
W. A. SIMONSON, Assistant Cashier.

Hon. FRANK A. VANDERLIP,
Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 5, 1899.

SIR: This Department is in receipt of your communication of the 2d instant, with inclosures, in which you request, if the Department can possibly do so, that the words "subject to appropriations to be made by Congress," on page 3 of the form of contract of sale of the old custom-house property in New York City be eliminated therefrom.

As previously explained to the bank by the Department, in its letter dated September 19, 1899, these words are employed in said contract form because, while the act of Congress authorizing the sale of said property empowers and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to lease the property from the purchasers, no appropriation is made in said act for the payment of the rent. Whether the words referred to are employed or not, it must be understood that until Congress provides an appropriation for the payment of the rent in question, there is no fund under the control of this Department which can be made available for that purpose, and that the Department, in the execution of the instrument referred to, does not intend to imply that such fund exists, or to take any action beyond the authority conferred upon it by the terms of the act of Congress referred to.

As heretofore suggested to the bank, the Department will include in its estimates for appropriations to be submitted to Congress, an item for the rent in question, and it is deemed unlikely that Congress will neglect or refuse to make provision therefor, in view of its direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to create the obligation.

It is, therefore, suggested that a communication be addressed to the Department by the bank stating that its understanding of the matter is as herein stated, and upon the receipt of such letter consideration will be given by the Department to the elimination of the words referred to from said contract form.

Respectfully,
F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. W. A. SIMONSON,
Assistant Cashier, National City Bank of New York,
New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, October 12, 1899.

SIR: I duly received your letter of the 5th instant.

Our objection to inserting in the contract the clause making the payment of the rent "subject to appropriations to be made by Congress," was that we were unwilling to consent to any modification of the terms of the contract under which we made our offer for the property. We have no objection, however, to a definite understanding that the omission of this subject clause shall not make the Secretary of the Treasury personally responsible for the performance of the contract. If the contract is executed as it was authorized, Congress will have no excuse whatever for refusing to make the necessary appropriation, and if, for any reason, it should refuse to do so, our remedy in the Court of Claims would be clear. With this understanding, therefore, that the obligation is that of the United States, and not of the Treasury Department, will you kindly have the contract executed and returned to us.

Yours, very truly,
W. A. SIMONSON, Assistant Cashier.

Hon. F. A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1899.

SIR: Referring to the communication from the National City Bank of New York under date of the 12th instant, there are returned herewith, for execution by the bank, the four copies of the contract of sale in connection with the transfer of the old custom-house property in New York City, having omitted therefrom the words "subject to appropriations to be made by Congress."

Please execute the four copies of the contract and return the same to this Department for execution on the part of the United States.

Respectfully,

O. L. SPAULDING, Acting Secretary.

President National City Bank of New York, New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, October 20, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Herewith we beg to send you, duly executed by Mr. James Stillman, president, four copies of the agreement covering the purchase by this bank of the old custom-house property, sent us by you for signature.

Will you kindly have the signature of the Secretary now affixed thereto, returning us one copy, and oblige?

Yours, very truly,

Hon. FRANK A. VANDERLIP,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, D. C., October 25, 1899.

GENTLEMEN: The contract of sale between the United States and the National City Bank of New York, in connection with the sale of the old custom-house property, is herewith returned (in duplicate) for correction, the execution of the instrument being unsatisfactory in the following particulars:

First. Inasmuch as by the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," a "lease, agreement, memorandum, or contract for the hire, use, or rent of any land, tenement, or portion thereof" is required to be stamped, and as it seems probable that the use of the premises by the Government will continue for more than three years there should be affixed to each of the inclosed copies of the contract of sale documentary internal-revenue stamps to the value of $1, this instrument being thought to come within the meaning of the law mentioned in so far as it provides for the use of the premises by the United States until the purchase price is fully paid.

Second. Properly authenticated evidence should be attached that James Stillman was at the date of execution the duly elected president of the bank, and as such president was authorized to execute the instrument on behalf of the bank. If the president did not have such authority at the date of execution, it will be necessary to have a resolution passed by the board of directors ratifying and confirming his act in executing the contract of sale at that time.

Please have these corrections made promptly and return the papers to this office.

Respectfully,

C. E. KEMPER,
Chief Executive Officer.

The NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, N. Y.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1899.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to Department's letter dated the 25th ultimo, returning to you for completion the contract, etc., for the purchase by you of the old custom-house property in the city of New York, you are advised that the certificate signed by the cashier of the National City Bank that James Stillman was the president of said bank at the time of the execution of the instrument in question is not sufficient, in the opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury, for the purposes for which it is requested. What the Department requires, as stated in its letter of the 25th ultimo, is a duly authenticated copy of the resolution or authority under which Mr. Stillman executed said instrument for the bank. In the event that he had no specific authority at that time there should be furnished a duly authenticated copy of the resolution of the board of directors of the bank ratifying and confirming his act in that regard.

Respectfully,

H. A. TAYLOR,
Assistant Secretary.

SIR: Replying to your favor of the 2d instant, we beg to inclose, duly authenticated, a copy of the resolution of the board of directors of this bank [illegible] the act of Mr. James Stillman as president of this bank in executing the agreement covering the sale to it by the United States Government of the old custom-house property.

Trusting that this is satisfactory, we are,

Yours, very respectfully,

W. A. SIMONSON.

The SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

This correspondence shows the history of the transaction between the time of the acceptance of the bid and the actual signing of the contract. A careful perusal will convince any unbiased mind that the Secretary of the Treasury was at all times carefully and zealously guarding the interests of the Government and protecting them in every way. Many contracts were submitted by the bank and rejected by the Secretary. Every attempt on the part of the bank officials to vary in the slightest degree from the provisions of the law passed by Congress was at once checkmated and the law absolutely enforced, both in letter and in spirit.

I desire to call particular attention to the letter of Shearman & Sterling, the attorneys for the bank, dated August 14, 1899, and especially to the postscript to such letter, in which they ask that the Government agree to give possession and close the entire contract by January 1, 1902. The bank was anxious at all times to get possession of this property, as they say in one of their letters, so they could improve it. They would have been willing to have paid the entire amount in cash if by so doing they could have obtained immediate possession of the property, so that they could improve it and put it in shape for their uses.

Now, let us look at the answer of Secretary Gage to this letter. It is dated August 19, 1899, and in it he declines to permit such a stipulation or limitation to be put into the contract, and gives his reason for the same. This difficulty which has since arisen, these claims that have been made without any foundation in fact, detrimental to the Secretary in conducting this affair, are all based on the false impression that the bank desired the lease to run as long as possible and that the Secretary of the Treasury was assisting them in bringing about such an arrangement when, as a matter of fact, the bank was anxious to close the deal as soon as possible and get possession of the property, and the Secretary of the Treasury was precluded from agreeing to any such stipulation on account of the fact stated in his letter dated August 19, 1899, that the law under which he made the sale absolutely prohibited him from making any provision by which the Government should lose possession of the property prior to the completion of the new custom-house. In my judgment Congress made a mistake in passing this law by which the sale of this property was authorized. There is no doubt but what this property, together with all other property in the United States, has been affected by the wonderful prosperity we have enjoyed since this property was sold, and there is no doubt but what this property is much more valuable now than when the sale took place; but it is not only unfair, it is absolutely unjust in the extreme, to charge the Secretary of the Treasury with fraud and intrigue when, as a matter of fact, the record absolutely and clearly shows that had he done as his critics now claim he ought to have done he would have not only violated the mandates of the law, but would have been subject to impeachment for a flagrant violation of his duty.

Complaint has been made that this money was not actually paid in cash, but that the same was paid by certificates of deposit, giving the Government credit for the amount stated in the contract. This bank where the money was deposited was at the time one of the legally designated depositories of the United States. It had complied with the law in that respect and had put up Government bonds for the security of all deposits, including this one in particular. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury might have demanded this payment in gold coin and immediately redeposited it in the bank, or, indeed, might have carried the money across the country to some other depository and there deposited it, but such course would have been not only inconvenient for the Secretary, but would have been foolish as well. This money was deposited the same as any other money in that bank or any other depository and was checked out in the due course of business the same as any other funds and according to the usual and ordinary course of business. I could produce ample authority as given in opinions of the legal department both under Democratic and Republican Administrations, as well as decisions by the Supreme Court, that a payment of money due the Government into a legally designated depository, and the giving and acceptance of a certificate for such funds, is in law an actual payment to the Government of the money named in such certificate. But it is useless to argue, in my judgment, a proposition so evident and simple. It is admitted that the Government was given credit for the money and that it checked on the bank and used the money in the regular course of business.

I can not understand how Members of Congress can justify themselves in thus attempting to arouse partisan spirit and political prejudice by such misrepresentations of the facts and unfounded assertions in regard to a transaction where faithfulness of conduct and strict adherence to duty has marked every step taken by the officials of our Government. The mistake, if a mistake was made, was made by Congress in 1899, when it passed this law, and, in my judgment, it is not only unjust and unfair, but unpatriotic, for Members of this body to try to shift the responsibility and, without cause or reason, cast suspicion upon public officials who can not be heard here in their own defense.

The contract, the only chapter left in this proceeding, and which I will give to the House, protects every interest of the Government so far as it could be protected under the law under which the contract was made. Since the making of this contract there has been no violation of it, so far as I am advised, and I have not heard anyone claim that there has been a violation of its terms on the part of the bank. I challenge anyone to point to a single instance wherein the Secretary of the Treasury has in any way failed to follow out the mandates of the law or wherein, since the contract was entered into, there has been a failure on the part of the bank to comply with its part of the agreement.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to ask the gentleman if he can tell us now what the terms of payment were which were actually agreed to in the contract, and whether that last payment is now due or not?

Mr. NORRIS. They are not required to make that last payment until the United States Government is entitled to possession of the new custom-house, as provided in this law, and it will not be paid, I presume, until the custom-house is completed.

Mr. YOUNG. Is that in the contract?

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, unless there is objection, I will print as part of my remarks a copy of the contract that was entered into.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have it now, if anybody has it.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say that it will take some time to read it.

Mr. YOUNG. Get down to the terms of payment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What was the arrangement made by the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to these deferred payments—whether or not the Government now can demand the balance of the purchase price and give the deed and still retain possession under the lease?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; not under the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. They can not do it under the contract.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Read that part of the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I can pick out that particular part at a moment's notice. While I am speaking of this contract, I want to call the attention of gentlemen who desire to see this report—House Document 264, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session—to the fact that in the correspondence they will find copies of proposed contracts that were sent back and forth between the bank and Government, and they might get the impression that the contract is found on page 42. As a matter of fact, the contract as signed between the Government and the bank, the final contract which is still in force, is found on page 35 of that document. The Secretary of the Treasury in a communication to the present Congress said that that contract was found on page 42, but I called his attention to the fact, after I had read all the letters in the document, that he was mistaken, and he sent a subsequent letter here to this House on February 15, in which he called attention to the fact that he was mistaken, and that the contract as modified is correctly copied in that document on page 35.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes additional time, in which to read the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. Let the Clerk read the contract, if they want it read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan, that the time of the gentleman from Nebraska be extended five minutes, in which time the Clerk may read the contract?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. It is only necessary to read the conditions of the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. I send the contract to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTRACT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.

This agreement, made and entered into the 18th day of August, 1899, by and between the United States of America (hereinafter called "the United States"), acting through its Secretary of the Treasury, of the first part, and the National City Bank of New York, of the city, county, and State of New York (hereinafter called "the bank"), a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, of the second part, witnesseth:

Whereas the act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, entitled "An act to supplement and amend an act entitled 'An act for the erection of a new custom-house in the city of New York, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," authorized and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to sell, subject to certain conditions mentioned in said act, the property in the city of New York now occupied by the United States as a custom-house and hereinafter referred to as "the old custom-house," bounded by Wall, William, and Hanover streets, and Exchange place; and

Whereas, in response to public advertisement, dated June 1, 1899, the National City Bank of New York, by James Stillman, its president, submitted a proposal in writing to purchase said property for the sum of three million two hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars ($3,265,000), on the conditions mentioned in the said proposal; and

Whereas Lyman J. Gage, as Secretary of the Treasury, under date of July 3, 1899, accepted said proposal, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress hereinbefore referred to (true and correct copies of which said act of Congress, proposal, and letter of acceptance are hereto attached and made part hereof and marked Exhibits A, B, and C, respectively); and

Whereas the bank subsequently waived the condition in its proposal requiring the delivery in escrow of a deed to said property, and such modification of the contract terms has been assented to by the Secretary of the Treasury, which said waiver and assent are hereby ratified and confirmed:

Now, therefore, the parties hereto hereby agree as follows:

First. The United States acknowledges the receipt from the bank of the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($150,000), which was submitted with its bid as a guarantee of good faith, and now applied towards the purchase price. The balance of the first payment, six hundred thousand dollars ($600,000), making the aggregate sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($750,000), as required by the advertisement for bids, shall be paid within ten days from the date hereof. The balance of the purchase price, namely, two millions five hundred and fifteen thousand dollars ($2,515,000), shall be paid upon the delivery of a deed of the said premises, in the form hereto annexed, marked "Exhibit D," conveying the same to the bank free and clear of all encumbrances. The said deed shall be executed and acknowledged in such manner as to entitle it to be recorded in the register's office of New York County, and shall be delivered to the bank upon the payment of the balance of said purchase price, when a new custom-house, to be erected by the United States on the so-called "Bowling Green site" (bounded by Bowling Green on the north, Whitehall street on the east, Bridge street on the south, and State street on the west) shall be completed and occupied by the United States. The bank shall, however, have the right to anticipate the payment of the balance of the said purchase price at any time, in whole or in part.

In case of payment of the entire balance due before the completion and occupancy of the new custom-house the United States shall deliver the said deed to the bank, provided the bank at the time of paying such balance shall execute and deliver to the United States a lease of the old custom-house property at an annual rental of one hundred and thirty thousand six hundred dollars ($130,600) (being four per cent (4 per cent) on the purchase price of $3,265,000), payable annually, for a term which shall continue until said new custom-house shall be completed and ready for occupancy. Meantime, and until the payment in full of the said purchase money and the execution and delivery of such lease, the United States shall have the right to continue in full and complete possession and occupancy of the old custom-house, and as a condition for so doing shall pay to the bank annually the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand six hundred dollars ($130,600), being four per cent (4 per cent) on the amount of said purchase price. And until the full payment by the bank of the purchase price the bank shall pay to the United States interest at the rate of four per cent (4 per cent) per annum, payable annually, on the balance of such purchase price remaining unpaid.

Second. The United States shall give at least six months written notice to the bank at the time when the new custom-house shall be ready for occupancy, and when it will deliver possession to the bank of the old custom-house.

Third. Should any repairs to the old custom-house building or its appurtenances be desired by the United States during the time it shall continue in possession and occupancy thereof, such repairs shall be made at its expense and cost.

In witness whereof the party of the first part has caused this instrument to be executed by its Secretary of the Treasury, and to be affixed thereto the seal of the Treasury Department, and the party of the second part has caused this instrument to be executed under its corporate seal, by its president, the day and year first above written.

(Authority to execute, etc., attached to original.)

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no doubt——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the Chair to recognize me.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair recognized the gentleman from Minnesota to make a motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair could not do that in decency while I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Minnesota to make the motion. Afterwards the gentleman from Georgia will have the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Georgia will be recognized to debate the proposition, but that the chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY] is entitled to precedence in order that he may make a motion to close debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. After which the gentleman from Georgia will be recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to the gentleman from Minnesota moving to close debate, and if he had asked me to yield for that purpose I would have done so, but the Chairman recognized "the gentleman from Georgia," who yielded to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to make a request.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. BARTLETT. Wait a minute. If I was recognized by the Chair, the Chair could not then, under any rule of any parliamentary body, recognize anyone else to make a motion to close debate until my time had expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I had the impression that the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Nebraska to ask leave to extend his remarks, and then I made my motion, not knowing that the gentleman from Georgia had been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Minnesota to make a motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the paragraph and pending amendments thereto be closed at 5.30.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this is an old matter, one that has not only created a great deal of comment and filled the records of Congress from 1899 down to this time with various reports, but one that has almost amounted to a national scandal.

I do not deny that the act of 1899 provided for the sale of this property, nor do I deny that the act provided for the occupancy of the property by the United States Government until the completion of the new custom-house; but I do deny that there is anything within the contract that permits the title of the property to remain in the United States indefinitely, or until the completion of the United States custom-house at New York, in order that the National City Bank may thereby escape the payment of its just taxes to the State, county, and city of New York. The contract has been read from the Clerk's desk, and it contains this provision:

In case of payment of the entire balance due before the completion and occupancy of the new custom-house the United States shall deliver the said deed to the bank, provided the bank at the time of paying such balance shall execute and deliver to the United States a lease of the old custom-house property, at an annual rental of $130,600, being 4 per cent on the purchase price of $3,265,000, payable annually.

In this same document, to which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has called attention, on page 46, House Document No. 264, first session, Fifty-sixth Congress, there appears a letter from Mr. Stillman, then the President of that bank, in which he says that by reason of a telephone communication made on the 18th day of August, 1899, between him and the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage, "We shall make the above payment upon the understanding, of course, that we are not liable for any taxes or water rents upon the property so long as you remain in possession and the balance of $50,000 remains unpaid and the deed is undelivered." This is the letter:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 18, 1899.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the permission given us when I had the pleasure of speaking with you over the telephone to-day, this bank will transfer on its books to-morrow, August 19, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, the sum of $3,215,000 as payment on account of our purchase of the old custom-house property, for which we will issue the customary receipt. Please instruct the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in this city to receive and hold as security for public moneys the required amount of United States bonds.

As the check for $150,000, inclosed with our bid and now in your possession, has not been used, will you kindly return it to us?

We shall make the above payment of $3,215,000 upon the understanding, of course, that we are not to be liable for any taxes or water rates upon the property so long as you remain in possession and the balance of $50,000 remains unpaid and the deed is undelivered.

We presume you are forwarding to-day the deed and contract, as the same were sent to you last Wednesday.

It seems from an examination of the title that the property contains 583 square feet less than we supposed, owing to the fact that the city has used a portion of the original tract as a street, and our attorneys advise us that it has had possession so long that probably we could not regain possession of it even after a protracted litigation.

Will you please give us a formal certificate, under seal, stating what notice you gave, by advertisement or otherwise, of the sale of the custom-house property, and that, in your judgment, this was in compliance with the act of Congress, in respect to due advertisement.

Assuring you of our appreciation of your attention, I am,

Yours, very truly,

JAMES STILLMAN, President.

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Was not that after the sale was made?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it was.

Mr. NORRIS. How could that affect the sale? That was simply their construction.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was the understanding which he said he had through a telephone message with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. That was nothing but the Secretary's opinion. There was no contract to that effect.

Mr. BARTLETT. Thus it appears from the evidence that after the act of Congress had been followed in the matter of advertising the property and the preparation of the deed to this property, the then Secretary of the Treasury changed the contract, and permitted the National City Bank of New York to reserve $50,000 as being due the United States, and postponed the making of the deed and requiring the bank to execute a lease, as was required by the act, for some purpose. Whatever that purpose was, the purpose was not to benefit the United States, because the United States could derive no benefit from it. It must have been, therefore, to benefit this bank, and the only way in which the bank could be benefited was that it kept the $50,000 wihout the payment of any interest to the Government, and by reason of the fact that the Government did not execute the deed and thereby pass the title to the bank, the city of New York and the State of New York and the county authorities of New York could not, so long as the title remained in the United States, collect taxes from the bank on this property. By this means, and the manner in which this act, as I contend, was improperly carried out by the then Secretary of the Treasury, the United States Government has contributed to this bank since 1899, in the way of interest upon deposits of the money due by the bank to the Government, in the way of rent of $130,600 a year, nearly one million and a half dollars, and if the completion of the custom-house shall be postponed much longer, the bank will have secured the property from the Government without paying anything for it. This kind of a transaction does not reflect credit upon the administration of the affairs of the Government by those who then had it in charge.

As has been stated heretofore and as was stated by Mr. Gage, the then Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to Mr. Stillman, the act of Congress did not provide that the Government should withhold the deed and that the balance of the purchase money should not be paid until the completion of the custom-house, or so long as the United States should remain in possession of it, but the act provided that upon the payment of the entire balance due, before the completion of the new custom-house and its occupancy by the Government, the United States should deliver a deed to the bank, and the bank should execute a lease to the United States of the old custom-house for $130,600 a year. But according to the letter of Mr. Stillman, the president of this bank, to the then Secretary of the Treasury, which I have read, that was changed so as to be understood that so long as the Government should remain in possession and the balance of the $50,000 should remain unpaid the bank was not liable for taxes or water rates upon the property; and the failure of the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the act of Congress and to demand the balance of the purchase money and to deliver the deed resulted in great benefit and advantage to this bank, whose directors had been so helpful to the Republican party in 1896. And from this same record—House Document No. 264—we know what this bank is and what it has done to aid the Republican party. We know that the National City Bank was organized some time in 1897, succeeding what was then known as the Third National Bank, and that the Third

National Bank had been a depository of the funds of the Government for a large amount—the money of the people of the United States—and that it paid no interest therefor; we know that somewhere, in New York and elsewhere, the national banks in 1896 contributed to that great corruption fund which alone enabled the Republican party in 1896 to succeed in the Presidential election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I do not speak unadvisedly. I hold in my hand evidence of the fact that the directors of this bank did contribute to that campaign. This same City National Bank was on June 5, 1897, seeking favors at the hands of this same Republican Secretary of the Treasury—were asking that the Government deposit be continued, because of the favors that the directors had done in aid of candidates of the Republican party—and I will read it. I read a letter dated June 5, 1897, which you will find on page 60 of this same document, addressed to Secretary Gage and signed by A. B. Hepburn, vice-president of the City National Bank:

NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, June 5, 1897.

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank, of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any changes which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We should like to remain a United States depository as at present. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Yours, very truly, A. B. HEPBURN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

What was that "canvass last year," and who are these directors? Some of them, Mr Chairman, were directors of great insurance companies which admitted, in the investigation recently held in New York, that they took the money of those insured in these companies and contributed at least $150,000 each year to the campaign fund of the Republican party in order to defeat the Democratic party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Those are the reasons given in one letter, at least, that has come to light where the National City Bank asked favors of Secretary Gage. I do not say that there are other letters anywhere in regard to this identical transaction, but the vice-president of the bank who would write to the Secretary of the Treasury asking favors because the directors of his bank had contributed to the political campaign fund of the Republican party in 1896 would not hesitate to ask for any other favor in order that they might make millions of dollars out of the Government. It is true that the national banks and the insurance companies rendered great service to the Republican party in 1896. It is true that the great chieftain and champion of the Democratic cause went down to defeat not so much by reason of the ballots of the people of the United States as he did by reason of the dollars contributed by these corporations. And, Mr. Chairman, if the signs now appearing do not all fail, in 1908 the man that these bankers defeated in 1896 by the millions they contributed to the Republican party will be the Chief Executive of this Republic and will prevent such wanton waste of the money of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this is an annual performance made by the Democratic party for the purpose of endeavoring to show political relations between a Republican Administration and some of the financial institutions of the country. I have taken some pains to look up the question of administrative influence with banking institutions, and I have found but one instance in the history of the Republic where an Administration showed a disposition to avowedly seek the influence of banking institutions for political purposes by the deposit of public money. And, by the way, that was a Republican Administration—that is to say, if Thomas Jefferson was a Republican. During his Administration——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the gentleman mind inserting some other instances?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I can not yield just now. I want to read a letter which I am sure will interest the gentleman from Mississippi. On the 12th of July, 1803, Mr. Jefferson wrote the following letter to Albert Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury:

I am decidedly in favor of making all the banks republican by sharing deposits among them in proportion to the dispositions they show. If the law now forbids it, we should not permit another session of Congress to pass without amending it. It is material to the safety of republicanism to detach the mercantile interests from its enemies and incorporate them into the body of its friends. A merchant is naturally a republican, and could not be otherwise only from a vitiated state of things.

The historian says that Gallatin gently put aside these demonstrations of Mr. Jefferson and administered his Department on business principles, with as little regard to political influence as possible.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not what Gage did.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The only thing that you have been able to charge against Mr. Gage is that a banker requested of him that he make deposits with his bank, a thing that President Jefferson asked his Secretary of the Treasury to do for political purposes. You have shown that a Republican Secretary of the Treasury was asked to make deposits, not that he did make them. Another time the same question was up and Mr. Gallatin again had to put aside the importunities of the patron saint of the Democratic party—Mr. Jefferson—that the public moneys of the country be used for political influence. Answering Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Gallatin says:

I am extremely anxious to see a bank at New Orleans. Considering the distance of that place, our own security, and even that of the collector, will be eminently promoted, and the transmission of moneys arising from the impost and sales of lands in the Mississippi territory would, without it, be a very difficult and sometimes dangerous operation. Against this there are none but political objections, and those will lose much of their force when the little injury they can do us, and the dependence in which they are on Government, are duly estimated. They may vote as they please, and take their own papers, but they are fomidiable only as individuals, and not as bankers.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, this annual performance may not be put on again for political purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Why, Mr. Chairman, is not a member of the committee entitled to recognition in preference to a gentleman who has already been recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] was a member of the committee. The Chair thought that he was obliged to recognize some one on the other side, having recognized some one on this side. The Chair thought it obligatory upon him to recognize the gentleman from New York, after which the Chair will state he will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], and then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], also a member of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But there will be no time then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, it is your own fault.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say it is a far cry from Gage to Gallatin, and I will not take up time to discuss ancient history. I do want, however, to call the attention of the House to some of the errors that have crept into this debate. One of the speakers said a little while ago that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had thoroughly investigated this matter. That is an error. That committee made no investigation. The fact is that shortly after the beginning of this session of Congress I introduced a resolution of inquiry calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the whereabouts of the deed to this property. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It was privileged. It had to be reported. The committee gave me a hearing. One of the assistant secretaries of the Treasury—Mr. Taylor—arrived and opposed the resolution, but after the hearing the committee unanimously reported my resolution of inquiry. It went to the Secretary of the Treasury and he sent a letter to the House a little later, saying no deed had ever been executed, and hence no deed had ever been offered to the National City Bank, and hence no deed had ever been recorded in the city of New York, and hence the city of New York could not collect taxes on this property.

Now, take either horn of the dilemma which you wish. If the property belongs to the Government and the title is in the Government, then I assert that the Government ought not to pay a rental for it. If, on the other hand, the property belongs to the National City Bank, I say the National City Bank ought to pay taxes on it to the city of New York. [Applause.] It has been asserted here that this property was advertised. We all know about these advertisements. The papers in the city of New York have a large circulation, and very few people ever read a little real estate advertisement in fine print stuck out of the way in some corner. I declare as a Representative from the city of New York that the men who deal in real estate in that city knew nothing whatever about this sale or these advertisements. The Secretary, in his report, which I hold in my hand, says there were three bidders for this property. Let us see who those three bidders were. One was the National City Bank, another was the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, and the other was a bonding company. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company is identified with the National City Bank and so is this bonding company. They were all acting in concert and with one end in view. All the facts prove it and sustain the charge of fraud and conspiracy.

Now, sir, I assert what several newspapers have charged over and over again, that the Secretary of the Treasury sent for Mr. Stillman, the president of the National City Bank; that Mr. Stillman came to Washington; that the Secretary of the Treasury told him how much to bid to get this property; that the bid was made, and that then this unconscionable contract was entered into between them—and it's a fraud upon its face. I do not believe there is a Representative of the people here who has read the facts in this report who has not reached the same conclusion that I have reached, and that is that this contract of sale is an unconscionable contract, a fraud on the people of this country, and a swindle on the taxpayers of New York. [Applause.] It ought to be annulled——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired——

Mr. SULZER. And no man can vote to carry out its terms and ever again look an honest constituent in the face. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in the very short time I will have to talk upon this matter I know I can not make clear what I think would become perfectly clear to those who can and will investigate the matter. The first proposition I submit is that the condition we are now in as to this item of the appropriation bill is absolutely the only one we could get into by executing the law of 1899. We have pursued that law in the sale of this property every step of the way, and all the charges that are made against the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be made against the Congress of the United States, if they are of any significance whatever, because the act required him to do precisely what he did do. The proviso at the foot of section 4 of the act of March 2, 1899, is "that the use, occupation, and possession of said property shall not be surrendered until the new custom-house is ready for occupation and final payment is fully made."

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has made clear that the property was sold as required by law.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not. Gentlemen are in the habit of taking up all the time in asking questions, and it seems none of us get to understand the question we are actually considering and——

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not yield. In the contract that was made in pursuance of the sale of the custom-house and the law, it was provided, as has been already read, that—

> In case of payment of the entire balance due before the completion and occupancy of the new custom-house, the United States shall deliver the said deed to the bank, provided the bank at the time of paying such balance shall execute and deliver to the United States a lease of the old custom-house property at an annual rental of $130,600.

That is the condition for the delivery of the deed connected with the final payment. Now, the clause that is proposed to strike out of the present bill is the clause providing for the payment of a rental to this bank for the sum of $130,600, the precise amount that the contract and the law required the United States to agree to pay as a rental, and gentlemen say because in some way or other the city of New York does not get all of the taxes it is entitled to receive, because of a good or a bad law Congress made, that we should break faith and not pay the money that it was agreed and stipulated solemnly in writing, under a law of Congress, to pay, and gentlemen say they now discharge their high duty as Members of Congress by asking the Government to break its contract with one of the banks of the city of New York.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The city of New York gets all the taxes it is entitled to or could get under the circumstances.

Mr. KEIFER. That is doubtless true, but the question of taxes is not one the Secretary of the Treasury was charged with looking after, and he made a contract that the law required him to make, and precisely as the law required it to be made. Now, about the matter of the deposit. Let me read the clause from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, dated January 10, 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Give me one minute more to read this, as it will explain much that has been talked about.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has agreed to recognize another member of the committee [Mr. SMITH of Iowa].

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated——

Mr. KEIFER. I can not ask to take time from my colleague of the committee, but I do ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may be allowed to incorporate this in my remarks, and the gentleman from Iowa desires the privilege of extending his remarks also in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the extract of the letter from Mr. Gage which I desire to insert is as follows:

> Fifth. The custom-house property was sold to the National City Bank, as the highest bidder, on July 3, 1899. Under the terms of the sale it had the option of paying in cash all of the purchase money at any time or any part it might elect above $750,000, which sum it was absolutely obliged to pay. It exercised this option by choosing to pay $3,215,000, leaving $50,000 yet due. No deed will be executed until full payment has been made.

The money, as the same letter of the Secretary shows, was deposited in the National City Bank just as it would have been in any bank depository.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States had the right to hold the title to the New York custom-house free from taxation in the city of New York until the end of time. Therefore no injustice was done to the city or the State of New York when the Government of the United States provided by this contract that it would hold this title so long as the Government of the United States occupied this custom-house for public purposes. The United States having that right, agreed to pay a rent, which was fair and just, of 4 per cent, the lessor to be exempt from the payment of taxes just as many of the rental contracts are made in the city of New York.

No injustice has been done the city of New York or the State of New York for that reason. But no injustice was done for another reason, because the law of New York provides for the levying of a 1 per cent tax upon shares of stock, their value being fixed by the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profit; and every dollar that the National City Bank has got invested in this property is now paying tax to the city of New York and the State of New York, and their complaint, if any they have, is that they are not able to levy a double tax upon the National City Bank. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is the whole case.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not true that the Government of the United States allowed this money simply to be credited to it in the National City Bank, as has been stated, but the same security that is required for every other deposit of the United States funds in the national banks of this country was required. Not only that, but I have it upon information this day received from the Treasury Department, in the reduction of Federal deposits which has been going on for months past the deposits in the National City Bank have been contracted and called into the Treasury just as have the deposits in every other national bank of the United States. [Applause.] We made a fair and square contract, at a reasonable rate, that wrought no injustice to the people of New York. We deposited this money as other moneys are deposited in national banks. We have been drawing the money out of this bank, just as the money has been drawn out of other national banks in the contraction of the Federal deposits, and the only question before this committee is whether you are going to keep your contract and pay the rent according to the letter of the contract or see these people go out and bring suit in the Court of Claims and recover it from the Government at extra expense and cost to this Government. [Loud applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SULZER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 83.

Mr. SULZER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

REPRINT OF REPORT.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of 300 copies of the report of the committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, the folding room informing me that the supply is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS TO THEIR EMPLOYEES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CODIFICATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is after 5 o'clock and nearly 6; I object.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint special committee be appointed, consisting of five Senators to be appointed by the Vice-President, and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the codification of laws prepared by the statutory revision commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States; and that the said joint committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress and to employ necessary clerical assistance, to order such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business, and to incur such expense as may be necessary, all such expense to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object at this time. I do not know whether I will object at some other time or not.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LE FEVRE, for ten days, on account of important business.

WILLIAM A. HAMMOND.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent that I may file the minority views to the report of the Committee on Claims on Senate bill 290, for the relief of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon-General of the United States Army.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not do it to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Having objected to one thing because it is after 5 o'clock, I must object to all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 7, 1906.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Rev. ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

From the house of sorrow, our Father, we come to the house of labor. So dost Thou lead us from the things to be borne to the things to be done. And as Thou hast given us Thy grace humbly to bow before Thy good providence, so we beseech Thee vouchsafe unto us Thy strength, that we may steadfastly lay hold of Thy purposes till Thy kingdom shall come and Thy will be done on earth, even as it is in heaven. Amen.

THE JOURNAL—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the Senate dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the Journal stands approved.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the railroad rate bill.

Mr. LODGE. Are we to transact any routine morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the rate bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will give way for a few moments for bills, if the Senator wishes. I gave notice yesterday afternoon that I would ask that no morning business be transacted to-day, but if the Senator is anxious I will yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the Senator will give way for routine business?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; for a few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint special committee be appointed, consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the Vice-President, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the codification of the laws prepared by the Statutory Revision Commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States, to have the same printed, and that the said joint committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, and to employ necessary clerical assistance, and to incur such expense as may be deemed necessary, all such expense to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now I renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the railroad rate bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. The motion which carried was that we proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the motion which prevailed.

Mr. FORAKER. A day or two ago, speaking upon that conference report, I referred to a decision recently rendered by the circuit court of appeals at Milwaukee, and I was inquired of at the time whether or not I had the opinion of the court. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] wanted to know, and I answered that I did not have it, but I hoped to have it before this debate closed, and that when received I would put it in the RECORD. I have that opinion now, and I ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD. I will read it, if necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the decision will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin. The United States of America, complainant, v. Milwaukee Refrigerator Transit Company; Pere Marquette Railroad Company; Erie Railroad Company; the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company; St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Company; the Wisconsin Central Railway Company; the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, and Pabst Brewing Company, defendants. In equity. May 31, 1906. Before Grosscup, Baker, Seaman, and Kohlsaat, circuit judges.

Baker, circuit judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding to enjoin the defendants from continuing practices which are claimed to be in violation of the Elkins Act. (32 Stat., 847; R. S. Sup., 1903, pp. 363–366.)

The charges in the petition are substantially these:

That the brewing company organized the refrigerator company, is the beneficial owner of the refrigerator company stock, and thereby indirectly receives the moneys paid by the railroad companies to the refrigerator company on account of beer shipments, as hereinafter stated.

That the refrigerator company (apart from the charge that it is a dummy of the brewing company) was organized and is being carried on as a device for the purpose and with the intent of exacting from the railroad companies a large proportion of the freight moneys for interstate and foreign shipments controlled by it; that it has obtained and holds contracts from the brewery company and other owners of goods whereby it is given the exclusive control of shipments to competitive points; that it withholds such traffic from railroad companies which refuse to return to it from one-tenth to one-eighth of the freight moneys and gives the business only to the railroad companies which contract to make such returns.

That the defendant railroad companies, with the intent of evading the law, have entered into such contracts with the refrigerator company, and thereunder have paid to the refrigerator company from one-tenth to one-eighth of the freight moneys on all traffic controlled by the refrigerator company.

That unless restrained the parties will continue these practices.

I. As to the brewing company:

The majority of the brewing company stock is owned by persons who have no interest in the refrigerator company. The stock of the refrigerator company was bought and paid for by the holders thereof with their own money and in their own interest. None of it is held in trust for the brewing company. The majority of it is owned by persons who also own brewing company stock. But the brewing company pays its freight in full, receives no rebates, and is not a party to the contracts between the refrigerator and the railroad companies. Under the evidence the most that can be fairly said of the relations between the brewing and refrigerator companies is that the former gave the control of shipments of beer to the latter as a favor and to enable it to profit thereby if it could. For failure of proof the charges against the brewing company are dismissed.

II. Objections to the maintenance of this proceeding against the remaining defendants:

(1) Contention is made that equity jurisdiction does not inherently extend, and can not by Congress be extended, to restraining the commission of crimes and misdemeanors.

To afford protection where other means are inadequate has been accounted the chief merit of equity. That the infraction of a complainant's rights may also constitute a crime is no reason for denying relief. Cases of refusal where no property was involved came largely, we believe, from the consideration that equity will not enter unenforceable decrees, and not from regard for the intended doing of the criminal act. If a complainant's rights, whether the higher and more sacred rights of person (Warfield's case, 76 Am. St. R., 727; Itzkovitch v. Whitaker, 39 So. Rep., 499) or the lower and more sordid rights of property, can not be adequately protected elsewhere, and if a decree and writ that will be enforceable can be framed, no court of equity should acknowledge itself wanting in the primary power of devising decrees and writs to meet the demands of the situation.

The evils that have resulted from railroad companies' secret abatement of published rates in favor of particular persons have long been matters of common report and discussion. If a person whose business was being undermined and ruined through advantages unlawfully given to a competitor should seek relief in equity, the objection that a property right was not involved would be wanting. Because the persons affected are so numerous and widely separated, because their injuries severally may be small, and because the United States has the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, in our opinion Congress very clearly had the power to authorize equity proceedings by the United States as complainant (parens patriæ in that respect) for the protection of all persons who would be injured by the unlawful practices. This conclusion necessarily was upheld in Swift v. United States (196 U. S., 375), though the contrary contention seems not to have been presented, and in Missouri Pacific Railway v. United States (189 U. S., 274), wherein the question was argued by counsel.

(2) The Attorney-General, of his own motion, directed the institution of this proceeding. Defendants claim that a suit of this kind will not lie except upon the initiative of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Section 3 of the Elkins Act opens by providing for action by the Commission after investigation. The bill, as it passed the Senate and went to the House, evidently contemplated no other mode. In the House the mandate that "it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute such proceedings" was amended by inserting after "United States" the clause "whenever the Attorney-General shall direct, either of his own motion or upon the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission." Whatever doubt concerning the authority of the Attorney-General to direct the bringing of this suit might arise from a mere reading of section 3 is removed, we think, by noting the history of the bill.

(3) A witness for complainant testified on cross-examination in substance that he was president of a rival refrigerator company; that he brought the alleged unlawful acts of defendants to the notice of the Interstate Commerce Commission; that the Commission took no action; that subsequently he called the Attorney-General's attention to these matters; that the Attorney-General stated to the witness that he would direct the district attorney to begin proceedings; that he believed the district attorney should have assistance, but doubted whether the appropriation at his command for that purpose would suffice to bear all of the expense, and asked the witness if his company would make up any deficiency; that the witness assented; that on the Attorney-General's inquiry concerning desirable special counsel the witness named Mr. Charles Quarles, who subsequently was retained by the Attorney-General; that the witness, by reason of his arrangement with the Attorney-General, has made payments to Mr. Quarles, and that Mr. Quarles represents the witness in certain lawsuits.

On this the defendants have based a motion to dismiss the proceedings.

That the Attorney-General exercised his own judgment in determining to direct the bringing of this suit is quite apparent. No witness, though hostile, can properly be criticised for calling the attention of the authorities to alleged violations of law. The facts on which the questions of legality depend are admitted by the defendants. No improper conduct by Mr. Quarles in eliciting the facts is shown or claimed. In open court defendants expressly waived any objection to the presentation and argument of the questions of law by Mr. Quarles on behalf of the United States.

If it be conceded that the law requires the United States to be represented by counsel who are as interested to see the innocent discharged as the guilty held, and that the Attorney-General is not authorized to retain special counsel, except on the basis that compensation shall come from the United States and nowhere else, it might be that the defendants would be entitled to a stay of proceedings until the United States should be represented by counsel concerning whose relations no objection could be urged. But this is not asked. And since the Attorney-General properly directed the district attorney to begin and prosecute this proceeding, and the defendants concede the facts on which liability must be predicated, if at all, they certainly are not entitled to a dismissal.

III. The character of the refrigerator company's practices.

The company owns refrigerator cars which it places at the disposal of railroad companies for use by them in handling certain kinds of traffic, and they pay it rent for the cars in the form of mileage. There is neither averment nor proof which attacks the company in its character of lessor of cars to the railroads.

But, under the conceded facts as we view them, the refrigerator company in its relations with the railroads appears in another rôle—that of shipper. From the brewing company and other owners of goods intended for interstate and foreign transportation the refrigerator company obtains the exclusive right to route the shipments to all competitive points, and then withholds or gives the business according to the railroad companies' resistance or submission to the threat of diverting the traffic unless a tenth or an eighth of the freight moneys be paid to it. Control of the traffic is as absolute in the refrigerator company as if it were owner. And in numerous transactions the owner is not the shipper. And if an owner, having full dominion in all respects, conveys to another the dominion for transportation purposes, that other in all dealings respecting transportation should be deemed the owner and shipper. In this case, if the refrigerator company bought the beer and paid the brewing company's bill less freight and then collected the beer accounts and paid the railroads seven-eighths or nine-tenths of the published rates the granting of a rebate or concession by a carrier to a shipper would not be denied, we take it; and yet, so far as ledger balances and profits of the brewing company, the refrigerator company, and the railroads are concerned, the present method in its results is precisely that.

The foregoing consideration is in answer to the defendant's insistance that the Elkins Act touches only the carrier and the shipper. But under the strictest construction (and that the act should be fairly interpreted to effectuate its remedial purposes, see New York, etc., R. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 200 U. S., 361) we think it was designed to restrain all "parties interested in the traffic." In section 1:

> It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation * * * to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce * * * whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier.

In section 2:

> It shall be lawful to include as parties, in addition to the carrier, all persons interested in or affected by the rate, regulation, or practice under consideration.

And in section 3:

> Upon being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of said petition said court shall enforce an observance of the published tariffs * * * by proper orders, writs, and process * * * as well against the parties interested in the traffic as against the carrier.

So, if the refrigerator company be not considered as the shipper, it is at least a "party interested in the traffic."

IV. In the practice stated it is evident that the railroad companies in acceding to the demands of the refrigerator company have (1) failed strictly to observe the published tariffs, and (2) granted concessions whereby they received a less rate than that named in the published tariffs for the transportation of property in interstate and foreign commerce, both in disregard of the provisions of section 1.

It matters not that the particular practice herein disclosed is not described in the act. The inhibitions of "any device whatever" that accomplishes the condemned results is a ban upon invention in this field.

So far as the fact of intent is material it follows from the consideration that the parties knowingly and deliberately did what they did.

Let a decree be entered against the refrigerator and railroad companies defendant in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought the Senator from Ohio had yielded the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. No; there is one other matter, if the Senator will allow me. There is another conference report pending here, and that is on the statehood bill. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] who has had charge of it is not able to be in attendance at the Senate, but I am informed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is associated with him on that conference committee, that it will suit his convenience, if we can agree to it, to take up the conference report next Tuesday morning. That is agreeable to me, and unless there is objection on somebody's part, I will ask that the conference report be considered——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his question of order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that the motion before the Senate is to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion has been carried, and the conference report on the rate bill is before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. And now I understand the proposition is to take up another conference report.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; next Tuesday.

Mr. FORAKER. I have asked unanimous consent that it may be taken up next Tuesday morning, a date suggested by the Senator from Indiana, who is not able to be in attendance in the Senate to-day.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can we not get through with this report?

Mr. FORAKER. I only make the request so that there may be an understanding about it. There are some Senators who want to go out of the city. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] told me that he wanted to go away to-night.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should have no objection to coming to an agreement that the conference report shall not be taken up before Tuesday, but I think in the absence of the Senator from Indiana a definite agreement ought not to be made that it shall be taken up on that particular day.

The Senate will remember that there was a very close vote in the Senate upon that subject, and that there is a marked difference of opinion between the Senate and the House. I think before that question is considered here there should be a full attendance of the Senate, and the Senator in charge of the bill should be here.

Mr. FORAKER. I am fixing that date at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana and to accommodate him, as I understand it. If that is not agreeable, I will give notice that I shall move to take up that report as soon as the conference report on the rate bill is disposed of. I prefer that course.

Mr. MONEY. That is right.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will state that I have tried to get into communication with the Senator from Indiana, but have been unable to do so. However, I ascertained from his secretary that he thought that date would be agreeable to him.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course, if the chairman of the committee is willing to set that day I will not interpose any objection, but I am unalterably opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I think that a time should be fixed when we can have a full Senate and there can be a full discussion upon that subject.

Mr. FORAKER. The question before the Senate will be whether or not we shall agree to the report made by the conference committee. That is the only question we will have up for consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. While that is the direct question, everyone who knows anything about it knows that it is the proposition injected into the bill of the Senator from Ohio that will be the controlling influence.

Mr. FORAKER. It was not injected into it by the Senator from Ohio, but by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. It was originated by the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I will withdraw the request, and I give notice that I will make a motion to take up the statehood conference report as soon as the conference report on the rate bill is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have no disposition to enter into a discussion of the bill, and I do not intend to do so. I simply rose to make an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina in charge of the bill.

At page 3 of the reprint of the bill, the term "transportation" is defined by the act. If the Senator from South Carolina will turn to page 11, beginning at the bottom of page 11, and continuing on top of page 12, he will find the words "transportation, or facilities."

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CULBERSON. One moment further. If the Senator will then turn to page 21 he will find that the committee have added the words "or transportation" in one place in lines 9 and 10, and in line 17 the words "rates or."

What I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina is the purpose of adding the words "or transportation" and the words "rates or" on page 21 of this reprint, in view of the legislative declaration of the meaning of the word "transportation" on page 3?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator had been in the Senate when I presented this report, I know he would have taken cognizance of the fact that I explained very fully that the words "transportation or facilities," at the top of page 12, had been inserted without any authority.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was not present.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say, the Senator not being present, it of course appears to him a little strange. I want to say, having been admonished by the Senate that they do not take kindly to our transgressing the rules in putting in new matter when we had no authority, I have already notified the Senate that it is the purpose of the conferees to obey the rule. We came in and told the Senate why we put these words in, that we knew we had no power to do it, but we thought it was a proper thing to do in order to have the language throughout the bill correspond and to clarify the meaning.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator somewhat misapprehends my inquiry. I am not criticising.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know that.

Mr. CULBERSON. What I want to know is what was the purpose of the committee in adding these words?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not worth while to explain what our purpose was when I tell the Senator that the conferees will take that out. We will not bring in a conference report here again with those words in, because we do not want to transgress the rule. We knew we had no right to put them in.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I understand the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is the one offered yesterday to instruct the conferees. Is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It merely expresses the sense of the Senate. It does not instruct.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I wish to submit a few observations concerning one amendment which was adopted by the Senate and disagreed to in conference. I realize that the Senators in charge of this report are very anxious to terminate this discussion and proceed with their work in conference. Were it not for the fact that the section which I in part represent in this Chamber is vitally interested in one of these amendments and in a large degree interested in another, I would not participate in this discussion at all; but in view of the deep interest the section I represent has in the one provision to which I refer, I feel that it is my duty to enter a protest against the conferees disagreeing to that amendment.

While I am on my feet I will take the opportunity to say in regard to the pass amendment or provision that I have received, as other Senators have, a great many telegrams from railway employees and from organizations of railway employees protesting against any provision being incorporated here that will prevent them from being supplied with or from accepting free transportation. I shall not take time to discuss that, as it has been fully discussed. I simply wish to say that I fully agree with them, and I believe that we ought not to enact any such legislation, and should we do so it would, in my judgment, be perpetrating a very great injustice upon those people. The matter of free transportation, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said yesterday, enters partly into the consideration for their employment, and we have no moral right to deprive them of that privilege.

I want to call the attention particularly of the conferees to the importance to the people of the Northwest in particular of preserving and retaining the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], which excepts from those prohibited articles which interstate-commerce carriers may transport, they being interested in the production thereof, timber and the manufactured products thereof.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] yesterday said that if there is any one article which these carriers should be prohibited from engaging in the manufacture of it is the article of timber and the manufactured products thereof. His argument was based upon the fact that the timber supply of this country is being rapidly depleted. That is true, Mr. President, but it does not follow by any means that the mature timber that is going to waste in the forests should be allowed to go to waste and should not be manufactured simply because the timber supply is not as great as it formerly was.

In the great forests of the Northwest there are billions of feet of lumber in matured trees which if not converted into some article of use will pass into decay and will be lost entirely. The fact that we permit the lumbermen to prosecute their business does not in the least prevent or hinder us from providing for reforesting the timber land and for providing for a new and wider growths of timber.

So I submit that the proposition urged by the Senator from Texas is not one that may properly be considered in this connection. One of the greatest sources of wealth at the present time of the Northwest, and particularly in the States of Oregon and Washington, is its forests. If you shall deprive us of engaging in the industries incident thereto, Mr. President, you strip us at once of one of the greatest resources we have and the effect of this provision will be to do exactly that.

I have doubted from the beginning whether or not this provision which we have incorporated in regard to coal mines, prohibiting railways and common carriers from owning coal mines and transporting their products, is the wise way to deal with this question. The evil that is complained of is the discrimination that grows out of the ownership of these mines by carriers and the advantage it gives them over their competitors. I submit that there are ways of preventing such discriminations without interfering with the industries of the country, and I have doubted very much the power of Congress to enforce such a prohibition. I have doubted very much whether we can say to a common carrier, "If you own a coal mine you may not operate it, or if you do operate it and transport the product you can not engage in interstate commerce." I doubt the power of Congress to enact such a statute.

There are some articles that we can prohibit entering into interstate commerce, matters that are deleterious to the health of the public, matters that are of a dangerous characer, such as dynamite. We may prohibit, probably, the transportation of such articles. We may prohibit the transportation of diseased meats and any article injurious to public health.

Those matters on the ground of high public policy we may prohibit, but I doubt seriously if Congress under the power to regulate commerce can prohibit commerce in any article that is a proper and a suitable article for commerce.

When the coal amendment was pending in the Senate some days ago, I suggested that the entire question should be referred to a committee in order that we might get a report suggesting the best method of dealing with it before taking final action, in order that we might better determine just what exceptions should be made.

I believe that would have been the wiser course. The Senate declined to adopt that suggestion, however, but it did agree on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to except from the operation of the amendment timber and the manufactured products thereof. And now the conferees' report that they have abandoned that exception.

Now, Mr. President, if we shall fail to insist on the amendment of the Senator from Washington, the result will be this: In the great forests of the Northwest under present conditions, logging camps can not be profitably carried on without railway connections in many instances. Railways have to be built in connection with such enterprises in order to bring out the timber. These railroads are usually only a few miles long, but many of them serve the people of the vicinity as common carriers. However, the real primary purpose of such railroads is to serve the logging camps in connection with which they are constructed.

They connect in many cases with the trunk lines, or they come down to the great waterways, such as the Columbia River and Puget Sound. They therefore become interstate-commerce carriers, and under the provisions of this amendment, unless you adopt the exception proposed by the Senator from Washington, they will be prohibited from operating such roads for the purpose of carrying out the product of their logging camps.

The same rule applies throughout the Northwest also to coal mines. There are very few coal mines in the Northwest that are developed, except in connection with railroad lines. That which applies to coal mines and timber is true also of copper mines, iron and other mines.

Mr. President, what good reason is there for prohibiting our people from thus engaging in the development of the industries of the country? There is a great evil that we are seeking to remedy. We all understand that in the anthracite region there is an existing and a really great evil that we wish to exterminate, but can not that be remedied without striking down legitimate and proper industries?

It seems to me that the Senate of the United States ought to be able to correct the evils that we know of and yet preserve the industries that we all understand and admit are proper and legitimate and desirable.

Why should the man developing a mine up in the Rocky Mountains, finding it necessary in the course of that development to build a railway leading down to a trunk line, be prohibited from doing that simply because we want to correct an evil in some other section of the country, which we can correct without depriving him of that necessary facility?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if what he has said with reference to lumber in his region is not equally true of coal or copper and other metals? Are not all of those industries connected with the operation of railroads? Then I understand the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator wish me to answer that now, or wait until he is through?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FULTON. I will say to the Senator in answer, it is true in regard to these other products in a large degree, but not to the extent that it is true of lumber.

Mr. BAILEY. I have always found that that which is most profitable is the first that the railroad acquires, and in doing that the railroads are not different from the balance of the people. It seems to me that which they most largely control is precisely that which they ought not to be permitted to control at all.

But leaving all that aside, the Senator from Oregon believes that the principle of this amendment, as applied to his section of the country, is vicious. Then, would the Senator want to offer an amendment that applies to his State and to the adjoining State, and if they think it wise there to allow railroads to engage in other enterprises outside of their business as a common carrier perhaps it will not offend us who are a long ways off? The Senator might offer an amendment that exempts the State of Oregon and the State of Washington from the operation of what the most of us consider a wholesome principle.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Texas vote for such an amendment?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President; because I think it is sometimes necessary to take care of some people against their will. I should feel compelled to vote against allowing Oregon to make that mistake.

Mr. FULTON. It is necessary sometimes to take care of people against their will, but I object to this universal disposition to assume guardianship over everybody and over every section's industries.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator would argue as though we are interfering with the industries of people. He is mistaken. We propose to interfere with no proper and legitimate industry. We simply say that a corporation organized for one purpose, engaging in other purposes, shall be denied the right to engage in interstate commerce. If the railroad is a common carrier, then it is not a manufacturer, and ought not to be.

I am aware that in some of the older States railroads have been chartered with special rights to produce and transport coal, but I doubt if a charter has been granted in any State of the American Union for many years which confuses the functions of a common carrier and the functions of other branches of industry. I will ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] if it is true that railroads in his section of the country have in their charters been authorized to engage both in the business of transportation and in the business of production?

Mr. FULTON. I will state to the Senator that what the facts are in that respect I am not at this moment prepared to answer. I do know that there are short lines of railroad connected with coal companies—not in my State, for I do not know of any railroad in my State connected with coal mines—but I do know of one line, from Idaho into the State of Washington, a short line of railway, whose real and primary purpose—I might say, whose sole purpose—is simply to supply transportation facilities for that mine. How it is organized and what are the provisions of its charter I can not pretend to say. I only know the manner in which it is operated.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. If it will pay one corporation to build a railroad and open and operate a mine, all under one management, would it not pay two corporations, each performing a separate service?

Mr. FULTON. The Senator, I think, will readily see how very impossible that is. Here is a company, we will say, that has a large mine in the mountains, distant from a railroad line. It may desire to open up and operate that mine; but it must have transportation facilities for the product down to a trunk line. If they are allowed, they themselves will build it; but if they have to get some other company, some existing line, to run a branch to the mine, the existing line may or may not do it. There may be many reasons why it would not do it. They may have business enough of their own, or they may say——

Mr. BAILEY. They may have business of their own in competition, and that is what we are trying to prevent.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will kindly allow me a moment further, they may say, "If we build a line, then another company may build a line, and there is not enough to justify us in investing the amount that would be required to take the chances." As an independent transportation proposition it may not pay, yet in connection with the mine it might pay to construct and operate the road. Then there may be financial conditions and hundreds of reasons we can imagine why such a company would not be willing to build a line. The man who is the owner of a mine would be willing at once to build a railroad to connect with the trunk line to take out this product and supply the markets of the world; it might pay him so to do, benefit the people, and injure no one. Why should he not be allowed to do that?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me one more interruption?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator says this mine might not be developed because the main line would fear to build down there owing to the fact that some other line might build down there. It is a most remarkable argument that the Senator asks us to believe, that one railroad would not build out to the mine for fear that another railroad might build out to it, and yet the railroad which might build would not be deterred from building when another had already built. In other words, the Senator asks us to believe that the fear of a second road would deter the first road without stopping to consider that the existence of the first road would deter the second one.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator will understand the proposition. I simply suggest a few possible reasons. There are doubtless many reasons that might be assigned; but the Senator knows that the important thing to a man owning a mine is that when he is ready to develop it he shall not be dependent on others for the necessary transportation facilities. He should not be placed in a position where he is dependent upon the will of some independent transportation line as to whether or not he will get his product out, and there is no reason why that should be done. I submit that it is not necessary to do that in order to correct the evil sought to be remedied by this legislation. I submit that these discriminations can be prevented without striking down and destroying legitimate industries and placing a handicap upon the development of the resources of the country.

The Senator from Texas has referred to the logging camps in the Northwest as if they were owned by the great transportation lines. They are not so owned. I do not know, and I will ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] if he knows, of a single great trunk line or main line of railway in the Northwest that is engaged in taking out saw logs or in manufacturing lumber?

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; I have asked the Senator a question.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, in reply to the question of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] I will say that there is not, so far as I know—and I have been twenty-three years in the State of Washington—a logging railroad company, or what might be said to be a railroad company, that owns a sawmill, a lumber camp, or is in any manner engaged in the manufacture or shipment of lumber.

Mr. FULTON. That is my information, as well.

Mr. PILES. One moment further. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] seems to labor under the impression that the great railway companies, the transcontinental railway companies of this country, are engaged in the lumber business in the greatest lumber region in the world. The facts are these: The great mill companies have become the greatest factors in the entire country for the development of the lumber regions. Those mill companies are organized for the purpose of building logging roads back into the forest and for the purpose of building and navigating steam and sail schooners to carry the products, which they themselves bring out of the forests, manufacture in the mills, and then transport on their own schooners. That is the business in which the people of that section of the country are engaged. No railroad company is engaged in that business. It is private people, who have invested their own private capital, who are engaged in this great industry. They spend more than $60,000,000 in the business in the State of Washington alone every year.

I agree with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]. As I said the other day, this is a question that ought to be dealt with in the manner provided for by the amendment which I proposed to the bill and which the Senate adopted.

Mr. FULTON. The information of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] is exactly mine. There is not a single great railway line that is engaged in the lumber business, but all the railroads that are engaged in connection with such business are little lines, built by private individuals, leading up through some little valley 5, 10, or 20 miles in length.

As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] suggests to me, these short railroad lines are simply incidental to and a part of the equipment of the main enterprise—simply adjuncts thereto; and yet they lead down to navigable waters, such as Puget Sound and the Columbia River, and connect there with vessels which take the product of the mills, or else they connect with some trunk line of railroad, which carries the product of the camp or mill to market.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to inquire if it is not true in the State of Washington and in the State of Oregon that the people who have obtained railroad charters and condemned the property of private citizens are really conducting private business?

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is very much mistaken if he thinks they are not subserving the public interest at the same time. Take, for instance, a little railroad line I have in mind, that is about 5 miles long, I think, running back from the Columbia River, in the State of Washington. True, it is a common carrier, but it practiced no deception in getting the rights of a common carrier, because it serves the people of that little valley; it takes the products of their farms down to tide water, so that they can place them on board ship.

It is a great accommodation and a great benefit to the people of that valley; but the main purpose in constructing the road was to enable the owners to get their own logs to market. If some one will tell me why that industry should be destroyed and why they should be prohibited from operating these few miles of railway, I will be pleased to hear the reason; but I have not yet heard it suggested by any person.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up further time. I know very well how anxious the conference committee is to get this measure back again into conference; but this is a matter of very deep and grave importance to the people of the Northwest. All through the mining regions the same condition prevails and the same result will obtain. If this amendment be enacted as it stands, it means the destruction of many industries now in operation; it means retarding seriously the development of the vast area west of the Rocky Mountains for many years to come. "Oh," some say, "you can prevent this by incorporating two companies, one a railway line and the other the logging, lumbering, or mining company."

Mr. President, we ought not to drive people into indirection in order to defeat or circumvent the law. I do not know whether they could defeat it or not by resorting to such expedients; but we ought not to enact legislation that must drive people to subterfuges such as that in order to operate industries that are important to great communities and to the public at large.

I trust that the conferees will take into consideration the death blow which they will deal to many industries of the West if they consent to disagree to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES]. I hope it will be retained in the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], just before the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] commenced his address, made a request that the conference report on the statehood bill be taken up on Tuesday next. I raised an objection at that time; but after consulting with Senators on both sides of the question I find that some Senators will be better accommodated on that day than on any other. I therefore withdraw my objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on the matter of the consent referred to, I have no objection, of course, to the postponement of the consideration of the statehood conference report until Tuesday next, or to any other time when those who are interested in that question care to give notice; but, Mr. President, I do very much object at this stage of the session to confiscating the morning hour. It is the only time we have for the consideration of a number of bills, some of which are House bills, with which we want to deal before the session ends.

It seems to me the purpose of those who are interested in the statehood bill would be subserved if they would simply give notice that they would call up the conference report on Tuesday next immediately after the morning hour, and not before. That is the point we want to reach.

Mr. GALLINGER. Seven or eight days ago, Mr. President, I reported from the Committee on Appropriations the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I have allowed it to remain quietly on the Calendar so as to give other matters an opportunity to be heard. I want now to say that when the matter that is now before the Senate shall be disposed of, which I trust will be at an early hour to-day, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I desire to make an observation in reference to the conference report. It will be remembered that when the bill was before the Senate, by a very large vote the Senate voted adversely to the proposition to increase the salaries of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners from $7,500 to $10,000. A direct vote was taken, I think, not a yea and nay vote, but there was no question as to what was the sense of the Senate at that time. I am opposed to the proposed increase. I have never been able to see why a gentleman, however distinguished he may be, leaving this body, where he served for $5,000 a year, should not be content with an increase of 50 per cent over the salary he was receiving as a Senator, or why a Member of the other House should not be content, or why a private citizen, who was, perhaps, earning $4,000 or $5,000 a year in his business, should not be content with a salary of $7,500. I do not believe, inasmuch as the probabilities are that the Interstate Commerce Commission will be increased in numbers, that there will be an increase of business sufficient to warrant this very large addition to the salary of the Commissioners.

I will not again more than hint at the fact that the Congress seem to be tumbling over themselves to increase the salaries of all kinds of officials, but are content with the salary that they themselves are receiving, and which has not been increased for a great many years.

Therefore, Mr. President, I trust that when this conference report comes back to the Senate the sense of the Senate as it was expressed will be adhered to, and that the Commissioners will be asked to serve for the salaries which they are now receiving, which I think are entirely adequate.

As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] suggests to me, there is no particular reason why the number of Commissioners should be increased. I do not believe that the bill which we are now passing is going to greatly increase their duties or their responsibilities or their labors, and I think the claim that is being made that these men will be overworked because of this legislation is not well founded.

Mr. President, if any expression of the Senate is to be taken by way of suggestions as to the feeling of the Senate regarding some items of this bill, I shall ask that the declaration which I send to the desk be voted on at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that the salaries of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners shall not be increased beyond that which they are now receiving.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is all I care to say. If any vote is to be taken upon any item in this bill by way of suggestion to our distinguished conferees, who desire to do, so far as they can, what the Senate wishes them to do, I shall ask that a vote be taken on the declaration which has just been read.

Mr. DANIEL obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to suggest to Senators at this stage of the proceedings that it is very evident if anything like the motion made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is attempted to be passed upon by the Senate, it will be amended and discussed, and we shall have the whole pass discussion over again and probably additional discussion. I want to protest against the effort at this stage of the proceedings to inject into this conference report almost an unheard-of action by attempting to instruct the conference before we have agreed or disagreed. We have agreed, and under the Manual of Conference Committees, which was prepared for the information of Senators, while it is declared to be in order to instruct conferees—

The resolution of instruction should be offered after the House has voted to insist and ask a conference and before the conferees have been appointed.

I do not think this conference committee should be treated differently from any other conference committee; and I shall, therefore, ask the Senate at the proper time, if these efforts to instruct are pressed, to accord us the same courtesy and fair treatment that other conference committees have had.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I ask that the motion of the Senator from Maine be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Mr. HALE moves, as an expression of the views of the Senate:

That passes issued by railroad corporations included in this bill be confined to actual employees of such railroads and their families.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to strike out——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to get through my sentence first.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to strike out the words "be confined to" and insert the words "shall include."

I now yield to the Senator from Maine for a question, but not otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia yields to a question.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President; I intended to make a statement in regard to the motion which I offered yesterday, but I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to address the Senate on the subject of the conference report. I have been yielding to other Senators, and, of course, if the Senator from Maine desires to speak before I do, I will give place to him.

Mr. HALE. Then I wish to say, Mr. President, that I think the conference committee on the part of the Senate have been beset with many difficulties and troubles. I believe the committee has done the best that it could under the conditions, and I do not think that it is an obstinate or recalcitrant committee. It seems to me that the debate has served a very valuable purpose, and, in order that the conferees on the part of the Senate may not be embarrassed by anything in the way of actual instructions on this subject, I withdraw the motion which I made on yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine withdraws his motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Do I understand that the Senator from Maine withdraws his motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has withdrawn his motion.

Mr. DANIEL. Then of course I can not offer an amendment to it.

Mr. President, I desire to say a few words respecting the conference report. In the first place, I will give a little attention to the observations made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. He complains that the Senate seeks to express some opinion in regard to some of the recommendations of the conference report, and makes the point that it is not in order, or not appropriate, for the Senate to express its opinion or give its instructions at this time, because, as he says, the conferees have not disagreed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said that under the rules set forth in the document relating to conference reports—

It is not the practice to instruct conferees before they have met and disagreed.

But we have not disagreed.

Mr. LODGE. It is not the practice.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not say it was the rule. I am objecting to an action being taken with reference to this conference committee that the Senate has never taken since I have been here in connection with any other such committee. That is all.

Mr. DANIEL. But, Mr. President, the Senate disagrees with its own committee, and it wishes to inform that committee, in some respects at least, in regard to its own dissent from the judgment of the committee. Clearly it is within the range of parliamentary law for them to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know it is within the rule and power of the Senate to instruct. I do not pretend to claim that it is not. I am only protesting against the effort to inject into this proceeding at this stage of the business an unheard-of method of treating it. That is all. When we come back here again, after having heard all of this eloquence and all these suggestions and criticisms, and after all the light and all that kind of thing that has been thrown on the matter, if the Senate is not satisfied with what we bring back the next time, then the Senate can do as it pleases, as it will always do, and instruct or disagree to the report or adopt it.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not insisting, Mr. President, at this time that the Senate shall instruct its conferees, but quite clearly it is not a thing unheard of, as it is within the province of parliamentary law and a thing provided therein. I think the Senator is a little extravagant in his statements on the subject, but let that pass.

Extremes meet, Mr. President, and those who are for wide-open railroads, with the privilege to accord free tickets to anybody they please, and those who are for hermetically sealed railroads, with no privilege to grant free transportation at all, are in close alliance with each other.

I can not forbear the reflection that perhaps there is in the minds of some, who are insisting that railroad companies shall not be allowed by law to pass their own employees who are engaged in their business without charging them the same rates that they do other passengers, an idea that we will finally become so wearied with this topic as to throw the railroads wide open and leave them to give passes to whomsoever they please.

It is my belief, Mr. President, that the conferees of the Senate would best subserve the public interest and best accord with the average judgment of this body in insisting on amendment No. 4. Attempt was made to ridicule that amendment, and frivolous amendments were offered to it, with a view to bringing it into contempt. No provision that we can make on this subject will be satisfactory to everybody. Any provision that is made on this subject will find a certain percentage of strong opposition to the conclusion reached. No ideality and no approximate of perfection can be consummated on this topic. But the question is what will best reach the average judgment and the fair public purpose in view.

Railroads are nearer akin to government than any other corporations except other common carriers, who like them have received from the Government the powers of eminent domain. They carry the mails; they have received empires as gifts from the nation at large, vast grants from States and from communities, and their affairs interlace with the general affairs of the people more than those of any other corporation or any great concern that ever existed or can exist.

It is for this reason, Mr. President, as well as from the physical nature of the railroad corporations, that so many gratuities are besought of them and that they find it so easy to grant them. The trains move at stated times, whether full or empty. Like the omnibus it can always take on another passenger. There are the seats, and it is easy to let this man or that take one whether he pays or not. The bishops of churches, the clergy of the country, the highest and best men in every community of the United States, men whose characters are above suspicion and above reproach, have time and again solicited favors from these transportation corporations, and the reason why the giving of free passes has grown into such enormous proportions is because of the general existence of the habit to ask for them on the part of so many different and such respectable portions of society. It does not grow, unless in all cases, by any means from any corrupt motive on the part of corporations. Sunday schools, congregations, Christian associations, charitable institutions, and all manner of people, some who are afflicted with hardships and some who occupy important relations to the public—all of these have besought these favors from railroad corporations, and the railroads have borne most of the blame which should be distributed throughout society if blame is sought to be charged.

Mr. President, let us look at this amendment. It forbids in general the granting of free tickets, free passes, or free transportation. It excepts from its inhibition, first of all, officers, agents, employees, surgeons, physicians, actual and bona fide attorneys, and members of their immediate families. The amendment of the House, which has been recommended to us by our conferees, cuts out that obviously just provision with all others of the kind. Many of the railroad employees of the Southern Railroad, which empties its trains in this city every day, live in the adjoining city of Alexandria. Many of them arrive here after a day's work, and sometimes two or three day's work, coming from far South. When the company has discharged its passengers and its employees for the night, it takes the employees back to Alexandria, where they may rest with their families before they reappear here next morning or report for the next trip; and the House amendment says that is a crime and ought to be punished. The Senate yesterday passed some very strange legislation, but surely it is not going to pass such strange and obnoxious legislation as this. So far from being wrong, it is right on every kind of principle, and we should rejoice rather than lament if the corporation can so conveniently and properly serve the interest and convenience of the men who take their lives in their hands every day in the service of the public. It also subserves our interest at the same time.

Let us look at this amendment. It excepts—

Second. Ministers of religion.

Third. Local and traveling secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations.

Fourth. Inmates of hospitals and charitable and eleemosynary institutions.

Fifth. Indigent, destitute, and homeless persons and to such persons when transported by charitable societies or hospitals, and the necessary agents employed in such transportation.

Sixth. Inmates of the National Homes or State Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and of Soldiers and Sailors' Homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge under arrangements with boards of managers.

Seventh. Female nurses that served during the civil war.

Eighth. Ex-Union soldiers and sailors and ex-Confederate soldiers.

Ninth. Owners and care takers of live stock when traveling with such stock or when going to point of shipment or returning from point of delivery.

It is also provided that this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents, and employees of carriers, and members of their immediate families, nor to prohibit any carrier from carrying passengers free with the object of providing relief in cases of general epidemic, pestilence, or other calamitous visitations, nor prevent such carrier from giving free or reduced transportation to laborers transported to any place for the purpose of supplying any demand for labor at such place.

These are all. It is nothing but the voice of humanity and public convenience that speaks in every one of these instances. And what are we asked to do about it? Not to give them free carriage at public expense, nor free carriage at the carrier's expense, but to permit the carrier to carry them, if it pleases to do so, and not insist that it shall charge them. Who is going to be hurt by that amendment? What public policy is challenged or invaded by the amendment? Indeed, it might be wider without being hurtful.

But there is a public sentiment in this country, not ill founded, that the privilege of free transportation has been abused and misused and too freely granted. Every man in public life knows how often he is asked to request free transportation for other persons, and oftentimes for those who are as able to pay as any members of society; and out of constant solicitation and repeated urgings railroad corporations have yielded in many cases and enlarged the free-pass system beyond the reach of any just or humanitarian consideration.

I wish to say a few words about striking out the term "knowingly and willfully." If we strike out the words "knowingly and willfully," and punish everybody who may accept or receive any discriminatory fare or discriminatory freight rate from a corporation, we will make a crusade against as innocent men as there are in any country. The word "willfully," in this regard, is either surplusage or, perhaps, worse than surplusage. "Knowingly" is sufficient; and for my part I hope that our conferees, who have already had such exacting labors on this topic, may be enabled to report that the word "willfully" has been stricken out and the word "knowingly" retained. Go down in a hurry to a passenger station in any city, or send a messenger to freight a box from here to any other city, and if perchance the passenger fare or the freight rate is discriminatory in the individual case or with respect to a class that embraces that individual case, then this proposed act seeks to brand as a criminal both the corporation and the shipper or passenger who received or accepted it, although the shipper or passenger may have been utterly ignorant of the discrimination made and may have been as innocent as a babe unborn. This is wholly unjust; and if such be the intention of the statute, it is almost inconceivable that an intelligent body like the Senate of the United States will indorse and approve it.

I shall say no more, Mr. President, save to express the hope that our conferees may be able to gather from the general expression of opinion here what is the sense of the Senate. I feel assured that they will exert themselves to their best ability to have it executed in so far as they properly may, and I can not repress the strong faith that so great injustice as has been pointed out will, in a measure, at least, be prevented.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, before this bill is returned to the conferees, I desire briefly to express the views I entertain concerning two amendments which have resulted from the conference thus far.

To begin with, take the provision on page 16 of the bill of the print of June 2. It shows the amendment made in conference, beginning in line 22 on page 16 and continuing thence to the close of that section. I venture the opinion that nothing like this can be found in the whole round of penal legislation. Take, for instance, a shipper of goods, wares, or merchandise, which constitutes interstate commerce, and it proposes to make that shipper guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to heavy fines and forfeitures and likewise to a term in the penitentiary for an act of which he may have had no knowledge at all until charged in court with the offense.

I do not believe as a matter of law that any intelligent court would fail to instruct the jury to find the defendant not guilty if it appeared that criminal intent was wanting in the transaction. That adherence to plain, simple rules of justice by the court will not, however, excuse the Senate for attempting to do that which a court would probably refuse to do, to wit, convict an individual of an act of which he had no knowledge at all. It is dangerous legislation, Mr. President, for the reason that the shipper might readily be made the victim of an agent's indiscretion, lack of intelligence, or possibly malice, because the shipper is made responsible if or through an agent the thing charged is done.

Let us illustrate. A wholesale shipper in the city of Washington, engaged in selling groceries to the trade, has a large business, commonly known as a "jobbing business." This merchant ships goods into Virginia, Maryland, and all the surrounding country. Owing to the extent of his business and the multifarious details connected with it, he must, of necessity, act through agents and employees. If a clerk, of whatsoever grade of intelligence or extent of pay, makes a mistake in billing goods from the freight office, over the Baltimore and Ohio or the Pennsylvania from this city, quoting a lower rate of freight than the public schedules will figure out, this wholesale merchant in the city of Washington, under this provision as it stands with the amendment, would be subject to fines, and would go to the penitentiary if any court could be found to enforce such a law as this would be.

The merchant might not have heard of the shipment, even. He might have no knowledge of the fact that such shipment was made. The freight clerk in the office might have miscalculated either distance or pay, and thus rendered a bill of freight charges less than he should have rendered. However, not only the freight clerk would be liable under the proposed law, but the merchant would likewise be liable, because under this phraseology it is not necessary that either party should know that an offense was being committed.

Mr. President, I submit that the word "knowingly" should be retained in the law as an ordinary compliment to the good sense and sense of fairness of the Senate. It is a reflection upon the intelligence of this body to write a law upon the statute books with such drastic penalties as this contains and deliberately strike out that which would go to the element of criminal intent. As I said before, I believe the court would substitute as an instruction to the jury that which we strike out here, by instructing the jury that they could find the defendant guilty only if it appeared that he intentionally violated the law. But perchance that would not be correct. If not, then this would be a most deplorable piece of legislation. It could be made the means of great oppression, because a malicious clerk could make an innocent man guilty any day he pleased, either by a mistake or deliberate calculation in not exacting a sufficient amount of freight. It is amazing, Mr. President, that such an amendment is seriously contemplated for one moment.

Now, I grant that the word "willfully" might make conviction difficult, because the word "willfully," according to the accepted definition, goes beyond mere knowledge and betokens evil intent. But the word "knowingly" merely brings home the essential in every criminal act. It repels the idea of accident or mistake, and is an essential part of this proposed law, if we want to deal fairly with the shipper as well as with the railroad company.

Mr. President, one other question which has been discussed in the Chamber for some time seems to merit attention. With reference to the free-pass amendment, I have observed the discussion from the beginning. It was proposed, and seriously proposed, that the inhibition be placed exclusively upon members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that the railroads, as to all other persons, might exercise their own judgment.

This territory of ours, the mainland of the United States, embraces over 3,000,000 square miles. It is the largest territory in the world subject to the control of one central government, save and except that of Russia and of China. We have, through a uniform system of education, escaped from the difficulties the forefathers contemplated in holding such a vast country together. It was apprehended for a long time after the Republic was established that sentiment would grow up in the Mississippi Valley hostile to the people on the Atlantic coast; that owing to tempermental and climatic differences the people of the Southern States would of necessity become the victims of a sectional feeling, and that those sectional feelings would ultimately result in the destruction of the Central Government. The forefathers did not contemplate, at the time the suspicions were first formed, the extension of our domain to the Pacific coast. In the early part of the last century empires were talked about west of the river and east of the river, and one great trial occurred in the city of Richmond, when a Vice-President was tried for treason, in that it was charged he incited the establishment of a separate government in the Mississippi Valley.

It is not long ago that you could tell a man from Indiana by his peculiar vernacular; that you could almost unerringly select the State in which a man was born by the manner of his speech. Now, you can tell a New Englander part of the time and a distinct type of the Southerner also by ordinary accent displayed in conversation. But this little peculiarity of speech is confined now to the two sections I have named. We have become, from one ocean to the other, a homogeneous, united mass of people. No one will ever be able to tell what rapid transit and easy progress from coast to coast and from interior to coast has done in the way of making the perpetuity of this Republic possible. Had it not been for the railroads, with their rapid transit, the electric telegraph and the printing press, a Republic stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean would, in my judgment, have been only of short duration. The people have benefited by these easy methods of travel. The Republic has been strengthened and solidified.

Important as it is to the people, it is of infinitely greater importance that their representatives, charged with the duty of legislating for the whole country, should not be a provincial set. It is necessary that a Representative in the House or a Senator in this body should not only be conversant with his own district or State, but that he should be conversant with every part of the country whose destiny rests in the hands of himself and his colleagues.

It is well known that the compensation of Members of the House and Senators render travel by them over the country extensively at their own expense impossible. We, of course, can pursue this method. We can invite into this Chamber and into the other end of the Capitol men of great fortunes and independent means. But I doubt if that kind of representation, however conscientious and worthy the men, would either be satisfactory to the country or beneficial to its interests. What this Congress ought to be in both branches is a thoroughly representative body, coming from the various walks of life, and representing men from those struggling at the bottom to the millionaire, if you please.

We have been confronted with a proposal to increase the pay of Members and Senators. I think through a mere matter of moral cowardice, that is not done. Now, we propose to single out the Members of the House and Senate, and practically say that those who are dependent on their salaries shall travel only between the capital of the country and their respective homes.

Instead of doing this, I would pursue what I think a more enlightened policy. I would have the Postmaster-General of the United States authorized and directed to issue free transportation to every Member of the House and Senate, good over any railroad carrying the United States mails. We are paying to-day over $30,000,000 for carrying the mails.

Mr. HOPKINS. Over $44,000,000.

Mr. CARTER. I am thankful for the correction. We are paying over $44,000,000 to-day for carrying the United States mails. This amount would not be increased one farthing if you required the roads holding the mail contracts, by contract stipulation to respect the passes issued by the Postmaster-General to the Representatives of the States and the people, gravely concerned in acquiring accurate information such as can only be acquired by travel and observation in many instances.

Now, Mr. President, we will take the large State of Texas, which my genial friend represents in part. If unable to get free transportation in the State of Texas on any railroad, I am sure that the large communities at distant points remote from each other in that great State will be denied the privilege of meeting and hearing our genial and eloquent friend.

It is useful to the people to meet their Representatives. It is useful to the people of other States to meet them. I know in our great, vast, imperial country west of the Mississippi, wherever a delegation of members of the House or Senate may go, the people in the village, city, or town will undertake in a most hospitable manner to entertain them and give them some knowledge of the country in which they for the time being abide. It is of great importance to that section of the country that the Members of Congress should be permitted to go there.

We have, for instance, to-day in the neighborhood of $38,000,000 being invested in the irrigation enterprise. What is the man of meager means in a New England State to do for accurate information on that subject? Will you depend on wood cuts and pictures and descriptive matter? We of the West would prefer to have you come out and see for yourselves the barren spot above the canal, and the beautiful, green, and productive land before the canal. We would like to have you come out and see how your neighbors and old friends in New England are doing out there. When you get the information by actual observation and contact with the people you will come back here better enlightened, more capable of legislating and contributing to the well-being of the whole country.

Mr. President, if it is not proper or if it is deemed inexpedient to provide that the postal roads shall carry Members of Congress or Members of the Cabinet and the President over the country free, then there ought to be an appropriation sufficient for the purpose. I am not one of those dealing in self-abasement to the extent of indulging the opinion that a ride on a farmer's wagon or a ride on a railroad will prostitute the honor and the judgment of a Senator or a Representative of the United States. These great railroads are as much interested as the people of our villages in having enlightened men come in to observe the country.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask my friend from Montana a question, with his permission. Suppose this amendment is adopted and a great calamity should befall any other city of the country as it did San Francisco in the month of April, when the railroad companies transported during nine days over 300,000 persons free of charge, and the estimated value of such transportation by the officials was said to be $465,000. The free transportation was continued later on, but that is the official record for nine days.

The question I wish to ask is if this amendment is adopted, Would it not be a penal offense and would not the railroad officers be fined or imprisoned if they carried those poor distressed people free of charge?

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly. They would all go to the penitentiary in regular order. We would have to appropriate money to impound the whole of the railroad staff on the western coast.

Mr. GALLINGER. And would not all those who had accepted passes go, too?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly. The three hundred and odd thousand would go to jail instead of going for relief somewhere else. A more ridiculous piece of legislation never was proposed anywhere than this. We know how it grew up in our very sight, Senators offering one exception after another, until the whole matter became a laughingstock in the Chamber.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator, if he has given investigation to this matter, if it is not also true that if the proposed amendment should be entirely eliminated as adopted by the conference committee and there should be nothing placed in the bill in lieu thereof, and the bill should be passed without it, the result would still be the same, for the reason that under the general law, the law as it now exists, the issuance of free passes is prohibited? Under the present bill, by an amendment, I think offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, anyone who would violate that provision would be still subject to penal consequences, although there may be no specification of a penalty for the issuance of passes. Is not that correct?

Mr. CARTER. I believe the present law prohibits the issuance of passes in certain cases.

Mr. BACON. And whereas in the law as it now exists there is no penalty, the law will remain as it is as to the prohibition, and this bill will apply a penalty.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I have made a pretty careful examination of the existing law and the pending measure and the proposed amendment to it, and I find the situation to be this: If we absolutely did nothing on the subject of passes, striking out the conference committee's recommendation and striking out the amendment as passed by the Senate, under the existing law the free issuance of transportation is prohibited. There is no penalty under the existing law. If I had a copy of the bill, I could point it out exactly.

Mr. FULTON. I hand the Senator a copy of the bill.

Mr. KNOX. It is on page 16 of the bill. First, referring to page 14 of the bill, you will observe the language is that—

No carrier shall, unless otherwise provided by this act, engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this act; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time.

That is clearly a prohibition upon the issuing of passes.

Nor shall any carrier refund—

Here is an attempt and a very——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will permit me just to finish this sentence, it will take only a moment:

Nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs.

So there is a prohibition against charging or receiving any different compensation, whether it be a greater or less sum than the rates published by the schedule prepared for rates and fares; and there is also a prohibition against refunding it by any device whatever.

Now, if you turn to page 16 you will find the following:

The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges as required by said acts or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law shall be a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the corporation offending shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000 for each offense.

So in my judgment if this bill becomes a law without anything upon the subject of passes at all, there is a specific provision that under the provisions I have read the issuance of a pass is absolutely prohibited to anyone, and it is impossible for a railroad company to carry anybody for any except the published tariff; and if they do they are subject to a minimum fine of $1,000 and a maximum fine of $20,000.

Mr. BACON. Those are the provisions, I will take the opportunity to say, that I had in mind when I made the inquiry of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it does appear that if the amendment proposed by the conferees should be adopted a railroad conductor would have to buy a ticket before starting out with his train. A brakeman would certainly have to have a ticket. The president of the road would have to have a ticket. The general manager, the road master, and the superintendent would have to have tickets.

Mr. PERKINS. How about the engineer and fireman?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if there was nothing said in this bill about the matter of passes would it not leave the law of 1895 in force?

Mr. KNOX. It would leave the law of 1895 with this penalty attached.

Mr. NELSON. The exception in the act of 1895 would be in force?

Mr. KNOX. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania be true, I simply want to say that it is a great pity this was not discovered and made known both to the Senate and to the country the day when this Joseph's coat of a pass provision was put in the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The pass provision was put in to make exceptions from the general rule. I take it the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely correct. Taking the former law in conjunction with this bill, eliminating all reference to passes, the two put together would of course——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will permit me, I am in some doubt as to the accuracy of my answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. He wanted to know whether if we did nothing the exceptions in the act of 1895 would stand. I have grave doubts whether they would stand. In fact, I am quite sure, from reading this proposed statute, that there would be an implied repeal of the exceptions in the act of 1895.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] that it was a great pity this had not been discovered earlier, I will state for my part that there was so much to be discovered I think it was pretty wise in us to have discovered as many things as we have already done. I think it will probably be a year before all of this bill will be brought to light.

Mr. CARTER. It seems to be a reservoir of mysteries.

Mr. President, I have concluded. I do feel that it is the interest of all the people, the interest of the Government, to encourage rather than to practically prohibit the free travel of Members of Congress over the country whose destiny rests in their hands so largely. It does seem to me that instead of putting in this drastic amendment it would be better to leave to railroad management the question of the transportation of the poor, the question of that benevolence which should not be prohibited by law where human hearts can be appealed to. It seems to me that a desire to conserve revenue and to perform faithfully the trust reposed in them will constrain railroad managers at all times and places to restrict the special pass privilege to the narrowest possible limits. But instead of this prohibition upon Members of Congress, if it is deemed improper to receive transportation free from the respective companies even in the States, then public policy of a sound character demands that we should provide otherwise to facilitate and encourage inspection and observation of the country by the body compelled to legislate for it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which it has been my intention to offer at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the word "knowingly" should be retained in House bill 12987 where it occurs on page 16, line 23; on page 18, line 20, and on page 19, line 9.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not put that in the form of an instruction, because at this stage it seems to me undesirable to do so. I should not suggest it at all, if it were not for the attitude taken by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If we reject this report, as we are going to reject it, under the parliamentary practice the bill stands exactly as it originally left the Senate, with all its amendments untouched and all open to conference.

The Senator from South Carolina says it is not the practice to instruct conferees, unless they have disagreed. That is quite true, but it is apparently the plan of the Senator from South Carolina that the conferees shall never disagree. So, under that——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Under that practice we should never get a chance to vote on any of these important amendments. I will yield in a moment.

The conferee does not represent his own views. He represents the views of the Senate. The Senate put in this specific word "knowingly" without division, on a vote. It is a very vital and important word. Before the conferees yield on that to the House, if the House demands that they should yield, I think the Senate's opinion should be taken on the question of the disagreement. I think we should have an opportunity to pass upon that question again before the conferees yield it.

Again and again on conferences I have sustained amendments which I had opposed in the Senate, and it has been the practice of every Senator who has ever served on conferences. Again and again I have seen the conferees on appropriation bills come back here with amendments which had been put in against the wishes of the committee, against the wish of every conferee, to take the further instructions of the Senate. Only a few years ago the House of Representatives overruled its conferees on the naval bill, and those conferees resigned and three new conferees were put in their place.

Now, yesterday afternoon the Senator from South Carolina, with all the zeal and energy which he possesses, was advocating here in the Senate the wisdom of striking out the word "knowingly," sustaining the merits of the proposition. My point is that what we want represented in the conference is the view of the Senate on that question. I have no desire to hamper the conferees; I have not the slightest desire to instruct them; but this is a case where, if the report is rejected, the amendments go back to conference, and the last instruction of the Senate was a vote, passed without division, to put that word in. I think, if it is necessary, we ought to express our opinion upon it now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am speaking now about the implied accusation of the Senator, or the direct accusation, that I have a plan to defeat the action of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I did not say that, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator said it seemed to be the plan of the Senator from South Carolina to give the Senate no chance to express its opinion by never having a disagreement.

Mr. LODGE. I said it seemed to be the plan to have no disagreement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did the Senate send us out to have a disagreement? I thought it sent us out to agree.

Mr. LODGE. We sent you out to have a disagreement, if necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. We tried to have a disagreement on some things.

Mr. LODGE. We sent you there to carry out the will of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. And we have tried to keep the will of the Senate by having the House yield wherever we could. We got them to yield forty-seven times out of fifty. How much more does the Senator want? Is he a glutton on yielding?

Mr. LODGE. I am a glutton on keeping in the word "knowingly."

Mr. TILLMAN. Ah, I see the Senator wants to have his own way in that particular case without the House letting me have my way at all.

Mr. LODGE. No; I want the Senate's way in the conference, and not the way of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from South Carolina is a minority member of the Senate conferees. The House conferees are two Republicans and one Democrat. It is a queer proposition that the Senator from South Carolina bosses the conference committee.

Mr. LODGE. Well, he shows symptoms of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have done the best I could to get a bill here that was workable and, as I thought, in conformity with the wish of the Senate, and I have got forty-seven agreements from the House. We got it. I do not say that I got it, because the other conferees were just as persistent and anxious to hold to the Senate amendment as I was.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, there are some amendments that are more important than others, and I think this is an extremely important amendment. I want to call attention again to a point in connection with the word "knowingly."

On page 16 the conferees, who object so much to the words "knowingly and willfully," have retained, in line 5, the words "willful failure" in regard to the publication of the tariff of rates. The publication of the tariff of rates lies at the bottom of all this legislation, and it would be manifestly absurd to hold responsible all the officers of a railroad or a corporation because some subordinate had failed to post in a station a table of rates, or because a table of rates once posted had been torn down. The utter absurdity of that is so manifest to the conferees that they have left in the word "willful," which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] thought such an objectionable word. They have left it in in regard to the publication, and yet they do not hesitate to strike out both "willfully" and "knowingly" in the case of a failure to perform duties under this act where imprisonment is the penalty as well as a fine.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator indicate the line?

Mr. LODGE. It is on line 5, page 16:

> The willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs.

Of course the word "willful" ought to be there. It is perfectly right in that place to have it there, and in the same way I contend, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has already contended, that it is monstrous to leave all these men, carriers as well as shippers, at the mercy of any careless or perhaps revengeful subordinate.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] pointed out yesterday a clause to which I think we have not perhaps given sufficient attention, and that is at the bottom of page 17:

> In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any common carrier, or shipper, acting within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such carrier or shipper as well as that of the person.

You make by that every officer of the road responsible for the act of every agent and every subordinate. For Congress to pass a statute deliberately under which men can be put in prison for acts where they had no malicious or criminal intent whatever, I believe is legislation of which Congress has never been guilty.

Mr. CULLOM. May I be allowed to interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator understand that the conferees on the part of the Senate could have done anything with the provision he has read?

Mr. LODGE. No; I think the provision is proper. I read it only to show the necessity for this word where you spread out and say that any subordinate shall not only be held responsible for his own act, but that also the carrier and the shipper shall be held responsible for his act.

Where you provide that in the statute, very properly, as I think, you ought not to leave out the word "knowingly" and make the act an absolute crime whether criminal intent entered into it or not.

Mr. President, I do not care to take more time on the question of the word "knowingly." I think it is one of the most important points in the bill. I have no desire to enter on a course of instruction to the conferees at this stage, but I do think that on as important a question as that, on which is dependent a man's liberty, we are entitled to some assurance that before it is abandoned the Senate should at least have the right to vote on it again.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

I entirely agree with what has been said by Senators as to the importance of the retention of the word "knowingly." Otherwise, outside of any injustice to the carrier, every shipper would necessarily have to inform himself as to every railroad tariff in order that he might know when he made a shipment and paid a rate whether or not it was discriminatory in any particular. I will not say anything further on that point, because I think sufficient has already been said.

Of course there is no disposition, or at least I judge there is none, on the part of the Senate to instruct or unduly hamper the conferees. At the same time it is of advantage to the conferees to have knowledge of what is the disposition of the Senate as to certain amendments which are in dispute among Senators or among the conferees themselves.

I rose simply to say a word as to one particular amendment. The Senate, by a decisive vote, amended the bill as it came from the House in the matter of the compensation proposed for the Commissioners.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 4 o'clock p. m.). Will the Senator from Georgia suspend for a moment? The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I just said that the Senate, by a decisive vote, amended the bill as it came from the other House in the matter of the compensation to be paid to the Interstate Commerce Commissioners. The present compensation of such Commissioners is $7,500. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives provided for a compensation of $10,000. The Senate amended the bill so as to make that compensation in future what it now is under the present law. The conferees have agreed upon a rejection of that amendment of the Senate; and we have, therefore, confronting us the fact that in the absence of any expression on the part of the Senate, as this bill is to go back to the conferees, they would naturally conclude that the Senate is satisfied with that action on their part.

For myself I desire to say that I am fully as much in earnest now in my opposition to the $10,000 salary for these Commissioners as I was at the time when the vote was taken; and from expressions which I have heard from other Senators, I believe that is also true as to them.

I myself can not be reconciled to the provision that these Commissioners should receive $10,000. It may be, in the abstract, that they are entitled to such compensation, but they are not entitled to it as compared with the salaries which the United States Government pays to its other officers. We have a general scale of salaries which runs through all of the offices of the Government, including the legislative branch, if you please, Congress. There is no reason why particular officers should be singled out and have extravagant salaries paid to them in comparison with the salaries paid to others. Without stopping to elaborate upon the matter, it seems to me utterly indefensible that one of these Commissioners should receive nearly 25 per cent more salary than is given to the Vice-President of the United States and that one of these Commissioners should receive 50 per cent more salary than is given to the circuit judge who is to pass upon his acts.

Mr. President, I will not go to the extent of saying, as has been said here on the floor, that the salary of Senators and Representatives is kept at the present figure because cowardice on the part of Congress prevents a change; it is not necessary to say that for the purpose of the application which I wish to make of it; but if we accept that salary as a correct compensation for Senators and Representatives—and so long as we do not change it we must accept it as being, in the view of Congress, the correct compensation—upon what possible basis can be rested the argument that an Interstate Commerce Commissioner is entitled to twice the salary of a Member of the other House or of a Senator? In my humble judgment there is no officer of this Government—outside, if you please, of the Supreme Court of the United States or the President of the United States or the Vice-President of the United States—who should receive a greater salary than a Senator or a Representative, and, in my humble judgment, the ability which enables a Senator or a Representative to properly discharge his duty is as great as the ability which is required to discharge the duties of any other officer under the Government.

There may be, and probably is, a necessity that the scale of salaries should be put upon a different basis. I repeat what I said when the matter was before the Senate when the rate bill was pending, that whenever it comes to a question of recasting all salaries that will be the time for us to consider whether or not a particular salary should be raised; but until we are prepared to enter upon a general consideration of it, until we are prepared to say what should be the salaries of Senators and Representatives and judges and heads of Departments—those who are called Cabinet officers—and of the President and Vice-President of the United States; until we are ready to go to a general consideration of it, it is not to be defended, in my opinion, that we should pick out an isolated case and raise a salary to twice that which is enjoyed by a Senator or a Representative.

I hope before the conferees on the part of the Senate shall agree to an abandonment of the figures fixed by the Senate, or rather the amendment proposed by them which fixed the figures where they are now, that the conferees will come back to us and get a definite expression of opinion whether or not the Senate is willing to give up the amendment which they made to the House bill in that particular.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not at all agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in his reasoning as to the salary which it is proposed shall be paid to these Commissioners, or that Congress should not properly pay the commission or an officer of the United States, where the public interest requires it, until Congress is ready to recast and revise the general salary list of the United States, including members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. I agree that the salary paid the Vice-President of the United States is inadequate.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will allow an interruption, I desire to say that I would make an exception in that case. I would vote for that.

Mr. SPOONER. I know, as everyone else knows, that the salary paid to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives is inadequate. It is in our power to increase our salaries if we should feel at liberty to do so; but it is not in the power of these outside parties to affect our salaries, although we have control over theirs. There is no relation whatever, in my mind, between the salary which ought to be paid to this Commission and the salary which is paid to a United States circuit judge who sits in judgment upon the acts of the Commission. The positions are entirely different. They are different in rank; they are different in honor, and they are different in another respect, that the judge holds his position for life. He is beyond the reach of Congress. His salary can not be diminished; and after he shall have reached the age of 70 years, if he has served ten years upon the bench, he is at liberty to retire and during the remainder of his life to receive the salary provided for by the statute at the time of his retirement.

The salaries are not fixed for the purpose of obliging the Commission. They are fixed, Mr. President, in the public interest and upon the theory that an adequate salary will secure the employment of men well fitted and well adapted by experience to discharge the duties of the office.

When this bill shall have become a law, there will not be and there never will have been in the United States an administrative body possessed of so much responsibility and with so much power to determine so many complex questions affecting the interests of all the people as this Commission, and I would be willing to vote, if it were necessary, to pay the members of the Commission $15,000 a year, in order to get men adequate to the discharge of these very difficult and responsible duties. It is in the public interest that it should be done.

Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it is his purpose to press his resolution?

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to do anything that is distasteful to the conference committee, but I should like to take the opinion of the Senate on that.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will not press it.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; I will not, if there is any objection to it.

Mr. SPOONER. Taking the sense of the Senate upon it is a practical instruction.

Mr. LODGE. It is.

Mr. SPOONER. And there is nothing in the situation which, in my judgment, warrants an expression of opinion in a formal way by the Senate upon any matter which has been reported by the conference committee. I think the committee has come back here having done a splendid piece of work.

Mr. LODGE. I think so, too.

Mr. SPOONER. I think their report shows, not only that the Senate conferees have insisted, as far as it was possible for them to do, upon the judgment of the Senate, as embodied in the bill, but it also shows that the House conferees have met the Senate conferees in a spirit of conciliation and with a strong desire to get at an agreement on the essential portions of this bill. It is a full and free cenference, in fact; and I think nothing should be done by the Senate which will make it in spirit other than a full and free conference. I think it would be an unfortunate thing to send our conferees back to conference with any sort of instruction.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I feel exactly as he does about the matter. I have no desire to hamper the conferees, as I have said, but it is a matter of great importance. I think the expression of the Senate, on both sides of the Chamber, in regard to it will be of value, and I have no doubt will be considered by the conferees when they return to conference.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I rose to say a word about the words "knowingly and willfully." I think it is a very serious question whether the word "willfully" should remain in the bill. The courts will construe the word "knowingly" not to be synonymous with the word "willfully," although sometimes they are dealt with by the courts as synonymous; but where Congress or any legislative body uses such words, the courts must hold that they were not intended to mean the same thing; that "knowingly" was intended to mean one thing and "willfully" was intended to mean another thing. The Supreme Court has passed upon the meaning of the words "knowingly and willfully" in a penal statute in the case of Felton v. The United States, 96 United States Reports, page 699. The words are found in the sixteenth section of the act of July 20, 1868, imposing taxes on distilled spirits. I need not state the case, but the court say this about it:

> Doing or omitting to do a thing knowingly and willfully—
> That is the language of the statute—
> implies not only a knowledge of the thing, but a determination with a bad intent to do it or to omit doing it.

I think, Mr. President, that the words "and willfully" may very wisely be omitted from the bill; otherwise I fancy that experience will establish the fact that they will be a gateway for escape. The word "willfully" in a great many cases——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, of course, knows that my proposition is only to retain the word "knowingly."

Mr. SPOONER. I know that. The word "knowingly" should be retained, in my opinion. Speaking from the standpoint of the shipper alone and only for a moment, the context provides as follows:

> And it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced. Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall—offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. President, I venture to say that in not one case in five thousand does a shipper, who goes into the depot of a common carrier for the purpose of ascertaining a freight charge between given points, consult the published tariff. I doubt if there is one case in a thousand where a person, unless he has had some experience with freight tariffs, can easily ascertain from the published tariff, with its classifications and its complexities, what the rate would be for a carload of horses or a carload of potatoes or any other freight between two points.

It must be remembered that all manner of people avail themselves of transportation facilities—the educated and the uneducated, those who understand our language and those who do not. All grades and all conditions of life are represented among the shippers. Farmers, manufacturers, merchants, professional men, everybody sooner or later will deliver for transportation to a railway company some sort of freight.

Mr. President, naturally they go to the office and ask the agent of the railway company what the freight will be upon a given article from such a point to such a point. They have a right to assume, in view of the act—if this bill shall become an act—and in view of the penalty imposed upon the railway carriers by this bill, that their information will be accurate; they have a right to act upon it, and they will act upon it. If one solicits a concession, that is knowingly done. If one railway company "offers, grants, or gives a concession" or a discriminatory privilege, they know that; but, as to the shipper, he may accept it without knowing it. It may be a mistake or it may have been done by an agent of the railway company intentionally, and without the word "knowingly" this provision will be a trap for the unwary and the innocent. It makes the fact malum prohibitum. It eliminates from the offense all element of intent, even of knowledge, and the Supreme Court has said in the very case to which I have referred that to punish where there is not intent shocks the sense of justice. They say:

All punitive legislation contemplates some relation between guilt and punishment. To inflict the latter where the former does not exist would shock the sense of justice of everyone.

And so, Mr. President, I hope the conferees—if I may have the attention of the big man of the conference committee——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not the biggest man. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] outweighs me, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is a much more distinguished man than I am.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina has been doing all the talking. That is what I meant.

Mr. TILLMAN. Naturally, as chairman of the committee of conference, I have tried to ward off all this avalanche of blows and criticism—I will not say abuse, though we have had some pretty hard knocks, too.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought under the circumstances I might safely compliment the Senator from South Carolina without offending the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I think it is of the highest importance that the Senate conferees shall insist upon the retention in this bill of the word "knowingly," and I think it would be very wise if they should consent to drop out the words "and willfully." That is all I want to say.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, in view of the avalanche of criticism that has been poured upon the conference committee by reason of the striking out of two words from an amendment, I think something ought to be said in behalf of that committee and in its justification, if it can be said. I think the Senators who criticise the striking out of the word "knowingly," as well as the word "willfully," give to the words a great deal more importance in connection with this particular provision of the bill than is at all necessary.

When we look at the personnel of the committee of conference, it is impossible to believe that the words were stricken out thoughtlessly or that in striking them out they undertook to make criminals out of countless numbers who would otherwise be innocent and law-abiding citizens. What I want to suggest to the Senate is that the element of knowledge is essential to the acts that are prohibited in the use of the words themselves that designate the things that are prohibited, and that it is utterly impossible, Mr. President, to give or receive a rebate, or to give or receive a concession, or to give or receive a discrimination, without knowledge being a part of the transaction. If some individual were accused of violating this provision of the bill, if it should remain in, no court could, in administering the law, pass sentence upon him when the transaction itself showed that it was the result of an error or mistake, because there can be no rebate as the result of an error, no concession as the result of an error, and no discrimination as the result of an error.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want to ask a question. Suppose the agent of the railway company by mistake gives the shipper a lower rate than the published rate?

Mr. PATTERSON. I intend to come to that.

Mr. SPOONER. That would be an error, would it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. I intend to come to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be punishable under this bill with the disputed words left out?

Mr. PATTERSON. I will not omit to notice that. Take the matter of a rebate. It means to draw back, to take from. If you apply it to rates, there must first be an established rate, and then there must be an agreement between the parties that, a part of it having been paid, it in some way or manner gets back into the pockets of the person who paid it. There can not be a rebate within the meaning of the law without knowledge upon the part of those who are essential to the transaction. That would be the case, Mr. President, whether it was in demanding a rebate or granting a rebate or receiving a rebate.

Mr. SPOONER. I agree to that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well. Then we come to the word "concession." I maintain that my claim is as applicable to that as to rebate. If you go to the dictionary, you find that a concession is declared to be—

(1) The act of granting or yielding, usually implying a demand or a request, and so distinguished from voluntary giving.

Then again:

(2) Anything granted, yielded, or admitted in response to a demand, petition, or claim, or permitted under pressure.

Take those definitions of a concession. How is it possible for there to be a concession unless something is yielded as the result of a demand, as the result of a request or a petition? And whatever yielding there may be upon the part of a railway company to a shipper of some portion of the published or regular schedule, it is absolutely essential to constitute it a concession that there should have been a request made for it in some form. So that whether you grant a concession, or demand it, or receive it, or take it, the element of knowledge is essential to it, and therefore there is no necessity for the word "knowingly" in the statute.

Mr. SPOONER. But there is no harm in leaving it in, is there?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am now, Mr. President, talking about the committee of conference for the purpose of showing, if I can, that they have made no mistake in striking out of the amendment unnecessary words.

Now, we come to "discrimination." The word "discrimination" is akin to concession and rebate. A discrimination may be a concession in the matter of charges, of rates, or of service or the manner of delivery and everything of that kind, and there must be more than one of a class before there can be a discrimination. The person discriminated against must be upon a perfect equality in every way with the one who receives the discrimination. It may be in the quality or it may be in the quantity; it may be in the point of shipment; it may be in the character of the goods; but before there can be a discrimination there must be a perfect equality in every conceivable way. Otherwise there is and can be no such thing in law as a discrimination. A discrimination necessarily implies an understanding, because, as with rebate and concession, there can be no such thing as a discrimination without intent. It is utterly impossible that there should be discrimination without intent and without purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. This bill provides that there shall be no unjust discrimination. Who is to determine whether the discrimination is just or unjust in the matter of discrimination between localities, etc.?

Mr. PATTERSON. I will read to the Senator the provision under discussion.

Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the word "discrimination" refer to discriminations that are defined previously? And those discriminations are unjust discriminations.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, however you may seek to qualify it, the main word, after all, is the word "discrimination," and everything it implies is essential to the determination as to whether or not that clause of the bill has been violated, and whether it is simply a discrimination or an unjust discrimination. What I maintain is that there can be neither rebate nor concession nor a discrimination without the element of knowledge.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the word "discrimination" higher up, which is alluded to here, has no "unjust" attached to it. It is simply the plain word "discrimination."

Mr. PATTERSON. When a person is indicted for the commission of a crime, it must be for the offense described in the statute, and a person could not be guilty of violating this section of the statute who by mistake or in ignorance received the services of a common carrier for a price below that which others would be required to pay. I have no question that, should anyone be indicted for violating this section of the statute, proof upon the part of the accused that it was a mistake or an error or done innocently upon his part would be a complete exculpation, because with that element in the case there could not be a rebate, a concession, or a discrimination.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] read a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in which the court held that the words "willfully and knowingly" meant, to give the exact phrase, to do a thing with a bad intent. It is not necessary in a criminal statute for the word "willfully" to be there, if to constitute the offense it must be done knowingly, because whenever one knowingly violates a statute he does it with a bad intent. One can not disobey a statute knowingly without disobeying it with an intent to commit an offense. So that "knowingly," in the definition of a criminal statute, necessarily implies a bad or an evil purpose.

I do not desire, Mr. President, to dwell upon this any longer. I thought it was due to the committee of conference to show, and to show it by definitions about which there can be no controversy, that they eliminated words that were entirely superfluous, and that, so far as the word "knowingly" is concerned, it was already there by legal intendment. I will not dwell upon that proposition any longer.

But I desire to say a word about salaries. I do not think it is fair to compare the members of a great commission like this with Senators or Representatives. There are no peculiar qualities required to make a good Senator or a good Representative. They must be intelligent men, or at least they ought to be intelligent men, and honorable men; but to be a Senator or Representative does not require any particular expert skill or knowledge. We have men all over the country seeking these offices and willing to make great sacrifices to secure them, some with a view of wearing them as they would wear a rosette in the buttonhole of their coats. As to Senators and Representatives, it depends upon the manner in which their constituency regards them. Are they good fellows? Did they serve in the Army? Are they good entertainers? Are they constitutional lawyers? Are they faithful and thoughtful of the welfare of their constituents? The honor of these positions, Mr. President, counts for a great deal with those to whom the positions are given.

But you can not have in the occupancy of the office of Commissioner any but those who have peculiar skill, peculiar knowledge, peculiar ability—knowledge, skill, and ability that are not common to the human family in the eminent degree in which they are required in cases of this kind.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if those are the qualifications of the present personnel of the Commission?

Mr. PATTERSON. I am not prepared to speak of the qualifications of the personnel of the Commission, and I hardly think it is the right thing for the Senator to do, to ask from a member of this body his opinion of the membership of the Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why not?

Mr. PATTERSON. But I have no question in the world—judging by the work the Commission has done, the indefatigable manner in which the Commission has been attending to its duties, the things it has accomplished in Philadelphia and Cincinnati and elsewhere in bringing to the attention of the country gross violations of the law and gross crimes committed by railway officers in high position—that the Commissioners do possess the qualifications to which I have referred.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is just what I wanted the Senator to say—that they do have the qualifications. They now draw only $7,500 a year salary, and if they have the qualifications to-day at $7,500, they can fill the office to-morrow at exactly the same rate.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no doubt in the world that they will continue to fill the position to-morrow at the same rate, just as those Senators who are constantly bemoaning the fact that they get only $5,000 a year will continue to be Senators, although the salary may not be raised; and if I can judge from the expressions I hear in the cloakroom and elsewhere there is not a Senator upon the floor who does not feel that his pay is wholly inadequate for the services he renders. Yet he continues to be a Senator.

But, Mr. President, I believe that the law as it will be imposes immensely greater responsibilities upon the Commission than those that are upon its shoulders at the present time. I have no doubt it will largely increase the volume of the business that it must do. It will vastly increase the degree of responsibility that they may assume and must assume, for now they will realize for the first time for a good many years in the history of the Commission that the responsibility and the duty are devolved upon them not only to declare that a given rate is not fair or is discriminatory, but to fix rates, and they must so fix them that they will stand the scrutiny of the courts of the country. I believe that for the efficient administration of the law the membership of the Commission should be increased to seven, and that for the character of men and the quality of the men who should compose the Commission, $10,000 a year is not too much.

Mr. President, I did not expect to consume any more time, but to be in fashion I ought to say something of course about free transportation. That would seem to be the sweetest of the notes that most of the Senators have sung since this controversy has been in this Chamber. With all the rest of them, I agree decidedly with the proposition that railroad men and their families should not be excluded from the privilege of free transportation. The trouble about free transportation is that it is wholly at the will of the transportation companies. Like kissing, it goes by favor; and the trouble is that those who receive the favors of free transportation as a rule are those who do not need it and are hardly deserving of it.

I heard the Senator from North Dakota talk about the tens of thousands of tuberculosis patients now in the mountains, who were there through the generosity of the railroad companies. That picture was overdrawn. I doubt if you will find one out of twenty who is there out of any generosity on the part of any railroad company. Those who are there are, as a rule, able to travel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator how many one out of twenty would aggregate if he would take them all over the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, it is not such a vast number at all. It is a goodly number, as a matter of course. But the great trouble about free transportation is not in interstate free passes, it is in free passes that Congress can not control at all—transportation in the States; transportation given to members of legislatures; transportation given to members of political parties.

Mr. President, I will venture the assertion, and I ask to be contradicted if I make a mistake as to any State, that there is hardly a State in the Union to-day in which, when a political convention of the dominant party is called, the convention chamber is not filled with delegates who go there on free transportation supplied by the railway companies. I read yesterday or the day before of the particular boast of virtue made by the delegates to the Republican State convention of Pennsylvania, that they had all bought their own tickets upon this occasion, and therefore they were not beholden to the great railway companies of the State.

There is no question in the world that the system of free transportation as practiced in the States of the Union is pernicious to the very last extent and to the highest degree. It taints the legislation of every State. It impedes the independence and the patriotism of the delegates to every political convention. There is not a political convention, there is not a legislature that meets in any of the States of the Union, which is not, by reason of the pernicious system of free transportation, controlled to a very alarming extent indeed by the favors the members receive and the favors they expect from railway companies in the way of free transportation.

I do not believe it affects Senators and Representatives in Congress. It is of too small consideration. The men who reach the Senate and the men who reach the House are not to be influenced in their attitudes toward legislation by the mere matter of a free pass. But that can not be said of State legislatures; it can not be said of State political conventions. There is not a Senator who does not know that the actions of conventions and the laws of legislatures are largely fashioned and put out by the influence of free passes from the railroads of the State. Those evils we can not reach, and it seems to me that there is a lot of unnecessary frenzy about the matter of interstate transportation, because I believe it is of minimum importance as compared with that which Congress can not reach at all.

My notion about this would be that instead of simply granting to the railroads the right to issue free transportation unlimited, authorizing them to do that which they may or may not do, the wise thing would be to authorize them to do it, but before they did it to require them to file a statement with the Interstate Commerce Commission in which they should set forth the classes to which they are willing to issue transportation, with proper limitations, and then when one brought himself within that class the railroad company should be compelled to give him transportation, and not allow it any longer to be a matter of favor, for in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred free transportation is given because of favors that are expected in return, favors that, as a rule, are not legitimate and that tend very greatly indeed toward giving the railroad companies the undue predominance that they hold and have held for so many years in the political and industrial affairs of the country.

Then every year the railroad company should be required to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a list of all transportation that it gave out, which list should contain the name of the beneficiary, his residence, and the kind and character of the transportation. When a system of that kind is adopted, there will be something scientific about it. As it is now, you simply say, "You may, if you want to, give free transportation to certain classes." I think the whole system is wrong, and that a more scientific, more sensible and rational system should be adopted, which Congress has a right to adopt in dealing with interstate transportation.

These are my views, Mr. President, and I am content with having expressed them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not find myself able to agree with the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and by my colleague [Mr. SPOONER], both of whom strongly favor retaining the word "knowingly" where it occurs in line 23 on page 16, line 20 on page 18, and line 9 on page 19. The significance of the word "knowingly" will be seen from either of the sentences in which it occurs. I read from page 16:

> Every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, who shall knowingly offer, grant, or give or solicit, accept, or receive any such rebates, concessions, or discriminations, etc.

Any lawyer knows that it would be necessary in any prosecution upon this provision to prove actual knowledge upon the part of the accused. The burden of proving the intent would be upon the Government. It would be practically impossible, with the railroad company in possession of all the facts, to furnish that proof for the Government, excepting as to the agent or subordinate, who, in granting the concession, merely carried out instructions of some one in authority over him. To retain the word "knowingly" is to open a way for the escape of all of the higher officials of the railway company, those who are in fact responsible for the violations of the law.

The word "knowingly" is not necessary in this statute for the protection of any innocent shipper or railway agent or official. No departure is made from the published schedule or regular rate, excepting it be knowingly done, both by the representative of the railway company seeking to secure business or the shipper seeking to secure a special advantage.

Mr. President, why has it so suddenly become essential that this word "knowingly" should be ingrafted upon this statute? If it is retained it amends the Elkins law and will render it necessary to prove actual knowledge in every case brought under that statute. Have Senators thought of that? I doubt whether Senators realize what a radical and far-reaching amendment to the Elkins law the introduction of this one little, innocent appearing word would really make. When the Elkins law was enacted a great mistake was made in striking out the penalty of imprisonment. This bill restores the penalty of imprisonment. Let us not now commit the greater blunder of so amending the law as to render it impossible to convict the high officials—the ones really guilty when rebates and concessions are granted by their subordinates.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] called attention to the fact that the conferees have not stricken out the word "willful" in line 5, page 16, but have stricken out the words "knowingly and willfully" in lines 23 and 24 on the same page, which he regards as an inconsistency upon their part. The word "willful," which they have retained, in line 5, on page 16, is in reference to the filing and publishing of tariffs. A violation of that provision could not occur without its being a willful act on the part of the railroad company. The Elkins law retained the word "willful" in the same connection. In the first section of the law it is provided that "the willful failure upon the part of any carrier subject to said acts to file and publish the tariffs or rates and charges, as required by said acts, or strictly to observe such tariffs until changed according to law, shall be a misdemeanor," but in all of the subsequent provisions of the Elkins law neither the word "willfully" nor the word "knowingly" is found.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator must be aware that the Elkins law expressly repealed the imprisonment clauses. There is no punishment of imprisonment under the Elkins law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator contend that it would be any more or less unjust to inflict the penalty of a fine of $20,000 upon a railroad company if the act had been done by an agent without any authority to do it?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly not.

Mr. LODGE. It would not be any more unjust, but it would be a great deal worse to put him in prison.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the Elkins law the accused, if convicted, is subject to a fine which may be as great as $20,000, and the Government is not required to prove the specific intent to secure the conviction and impose the penalty.

Mr. LODGE. Then it needed amendment worse than I thought it did.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It never has been complained of as requiring amendment in this respect. It certainly ought not to be so amended now. Neither "knowingly" nor "willfully" should be injected into this statute, and the conferees did wisely in striking them out. The only purpose served by these words is to protect the higher officials and embarrass the Government in the enforcement of the law. In every case where some agent or other employee is found violating the law it will be necessary to prove that the official higher up knowingly and willfully gave the rebate, or that the person receiving it knowingly and willfully received it.

The words "knowingly" and "willfully" first came into use in some of the early English statutes. They came in at a time when almost every violation of a statute was a felony and not a misdemeanor.

They put in a new element. The willful intent and knowledge had to be proven as well as the actual violation of the statute. When the statutes made every offense a felony this was just. In the case of a misdemeanor it is not defensible. Of late the tendency of legislation which defines misdemeanors is to omit these words. The individual is presumed to know the statute. This is especially true of statutes prescribing rules and regulations for trade and commerce. It is inconceivable that a man should receive a rebate and not know that he is violating the law, or that an officer of the railroad company will pay one and not know that he is violating the law, or that an agent of the company will give a rebate or some other discrimination in violation of the law and not know it. Furthermore, the agents of railroad companies do not deviate from the published schedules or the rules and practices of the company without the authorization of some one in authority. If they did not have such authorization it would be impossible for them to carry out the agreements which they make to violate the law.

Under such conditions it is preposterous to say that the violation in such cases could be committed without the knowledge and the consent of the superior. The striking out of the word "willfully" is not sufficient. The word "knowingly" ought also to be omitted. I understand that representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission appeared before the conference committee and quickly made it clear that these words would only serve to embarrass the Commission and that it would be impossible to reach any of the real offenders and punish them if these words were allowed to remain in the bill.

These words are not required for the protection of a single innocent person. They would prove an obstruction to prosecution behind which the real culprits in the violation of this proposed law could escape. The Senate should stand by the action of the conferees and should not put itself on record as favoring a proposition which the officers charged with the enforcement of the statute are unanimous in declaring will embarrass them and will to an extent nullify the plain intention of the law.

I wish to say a word upon another provision in the bill—that pertaining to passes. It is entirely unnecessary, and I hesitate to detain the Senate for a moment upon that branch of the discussion which relates to the granting of free transportation to employees of railroad companies. I do not believe that the passes which have always been granted to railway employees have really been in danger since this bill first came up for discussion several weeks ago. I am aware that the railway employees have been much exercised and alarmed for fear that such an amendment would be adopted and become a part of the law. But, in fact, there never has been any real danger of that.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator that railroads ought to give their employees passes, but I wish to ask the Senator a question. Suppose the conferees should take the bill and strike out in its entirety the pass amendment and leave the amendment adopted by the Senate on page 14, and say nothing more about passes. That amendment reads as follows:

> Nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in such tariffs.

Now, is it not true that if this amendment should stay in the bill, as adopted by the Senate heretofore, and we should strike out everything relating to passes, that the railroads would be deprived of the privilege of giving to their employees passes? While probably it was not intended to have any such effect, strictly construed, would it not have that effect?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am inclined to think it would. I wish, Mr. President, to be clearly understood. I am in favor of retaining in this bill the declaration, first, with respect to the prohibition of passes generally, and then making the specific exceptions, eliminating from that prohibition those classes to which it should not in reason apply. I am in favor of excepting from the prohibition—or, to state it more explicitly, I am in favor of allowing the railroads to issue passes to their employees, to the families of the employees, and to the officers of their organizations. I think they should be allowed to issue passes to care takers traveling with live stock, where the railroads require some one to accompany the stock.

Aside from these exceptions, and one other which I shall presently mention, I think the law should clearly prohibit the issue, the use, and application for free passes or free transportation. I do not believe that it is sufficient to simply prohibit public officials from receiving passes. It is a question in which all people are interested. The discrimination is one which affects the entire public. It is but a few years since one of the leading auditors of a great railway system declared that at least 10 per cent of all the passenger traffic of the country was upon free transportation.

If you apply that to the transportation of to-day, it means that those riding upon free transportation secure privileges the value of which would amount to the railroads, if such transportation were paid for at regular rates, to something like $50,000,000 a year. Now, that means a considerable addition to the transportation charge of every man, woman, and child paying fare on the railroads of the country.

Mr. President, I do not wish to repeat what has been said here in this discussion, but I do wish to call the attention of the conferees to one subject which has not been referred to in this debate. It seems to me that an exception should be made in this statute with respect to railway mail clerks, post-office and rural-route inspectors.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It does seem to me that the United States is fully able to pay for the transportation of any of its officials, mail clerks, inspectors, or otherwise; and if the postal laws do not provide that railway mail clerks who may be off duty may travel and see their families free, I think the remedy could be applied better in the Post-Office appropriation bill rather than in this measure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite agree with the Senator from South Carolina that provision might well have been made in the Post-Office appropriation bill. It was not made in the Post-Office appropriation bill. That bill has passed the House of Representatives and passed the Senate without any amendment in that respect; and, as I understand the rules of both bodies, although the bill is now in conference, no amendment can be added which will reach that provision.

Yesterday when I expected to have said a word on this subject, I communicated with the Post-Office Department by telephone to ascertain the view of the Postmaster-General and the Assistant Attorney-General of that Department with respect to this matter. This morning I called there, and the report which I got from the Post-Office Department over the telephone was confirmed. I offer this to the Senate conferees as a suggestion worthy of their consideration.

The Post-Office Department is struggling every year with a deficiency that almost doubles annually. Postmaster-General Cortelyou is constantly improving the service, and at the same time putting forth every effort to make a saving and reduce expenditure wherever possible. His conduct of the business of that great Department is worthy of the very highest commendation. He is constantly vigilant to economize in every branch of the service while improving its efficiency. The larger matters are carefully guarded, and at the same time every little detail is watched, making a saving here and a saving there, in order that the rapidly increasing deficiency shall be met and checked.

In the matter of the sale of the little booklets containing postage stamps, they are saving something like $315,000 for the fiscal year. By requiring postmasters to report to the Department the excess received on the sale of stamped envelopes, where the sales of single envelopes are made, instead of requiring them to report the sales of an entire package, as heretofore, they are saving nearly $50,000 a year. Every effort is being put forth by the Postmaster-General to check this growing deficiency and, if possible, to reduce it in the future.

Now, if there is to be imposed upon that Department the charge of paying for the transportation of some 17,000 postal clerks and of all the railway route inspectors and of the post-office inspectors, I am informed by the Postmaster-General that it will increase the deficiency at least $1,000,000 a year.

If we were in possession of the post-office appropriation bill, and if there was an opportunity to introduce into it an amendment requiring the railroad companies, for the $43,000,000 which they receive for carrying the mails for the Government and the $6,000,000 in addition which they receive for the rentals of postal cars, as a part of the consideration to furnish transportation to these employees of that Department, it would be another thing.

That measure, however, has passed beyond the reach of the Senate. It has passed beyond the reach of the House. We are in the closing days of this session. Should a sweeping prohibition of passes be adopted such as reported by the conferees the only opportunity to provide for the employees of the Post-Office Department is to add an exception to the pass provision of this bill, unless an independent bill could be passed. In consideration of the great importance of the matter I ask the attention of the conferees to the opinion of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very certain that the very document the Senator is now going to read was sent to the conferees. We considered it, and it was the opinion of all of us—all six—that the United States ought to pay for its employees, and that the postal clerks ought by the contract to be hauled to their homes.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator right there let me say a word, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield.

Mr. CLAY. We pay to the railroads about $40,000,000 for hauling our mails.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. About $49,000,000, as I remember the figures.

Mr. CLAY. We pay between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 for the rental of cars. Under existing law the railroads carry the railway mail clerks from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——
Mr. CLAY. One moment.
Mr. CARTER. In order that——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.
Mr. CARTER. In order that the Senator may have the definite figures with reference to railway mail pay for transportation by railroad routes, it is $43,000,000. It is $10,000,000 more for the rental of cars.
Mr. CLAY. I had reference, and doubtless the Senator from Wisconsin had reference, to the amount paid for cars and the amount paid for hauling the mails; and it amounts to nearly $50,000,000.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is just a little short of $50,000,000.
Mr. CLAY. That is correct. Now, I say, if by the passage of this rate bill we intend to deprive the Post-Office Department of the right to have these employees carried free of charge, it is time for Senators to consider this feature of the measure, because it will cost between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000 per year to carry the railway clerks and employees from one section of the country to the other.
Mr. GALLINGER. They are now carried free, are they not?
Mr. CLAY. They are carried now in consideration of the $43,000,000 that we pay for the purpose of hauling the mails and the $7,000,000 that we pay for the rental of cars. Mr. President, we pay more than we ought to pay at the present time for the carrying of these clerks and for the hauling of the mails. Under no circumstances ought we to pay hereafter the amount now paid for the carrying of these clerks, nor should we under any circumstances continue to pay the amount we pay at present for the hauling of the mails and for the rental of the cars.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.
Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia in what way would this bill, when it becomes a law, interfere with the contracts now existing between the Government and the railroads in regard to the carriage of mails and the transportation of mail clerks?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me——
Mr. CLAY. I was going to say to the Senator——
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg your pardon; make your own answer. I yield to you.
Mr. CLAY. I was going to say I had not thought that it did, but it is worthy of discussion. The Senator from Wisconsin says it does, that under the feature of the bill which he is now discussing it will be impossible for the railroads to carry these employees without a violation of this statute. If that is true it is a matter that we certainly ought to consider.
Mr. TILLMAN. We would have to reconsider our action and bring the bill back here and go into its consideration again, because the conferees can not legislate on all these new matters. They would take us by the heels and kick us out and put new men in charge.
Mr. CLAY. The pass amendment, under no circumstances, ought to apply to railway mail clerks. We get as a part of the consideration for the money we pay at the present time for the purpose of hauling the mails and for the purpose of renting cars the hauling of the railway mail clerks. If this pass amendment is going to interfere with existing conditions, it is time to consider that feature of it.
Mr. TILLMAN. I am only calling attention to the fact that under the rules of the Senate, or the usages of the Senate, as we have been told here for the last three days, the conferees can not do this thing. You will have to get the bill back in here and fix your bill better, and then we will try to fix it ourselves.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say that the contracts between the Government and the railway company for the carrying of the mails do not specifically provide for the carrying of the railway mail clerks. All that I have said upon this subject has reference to the carrying of the railway mail clerks from their homes to the points where they start on their regular runs and their return home again after they have made their run with the mail car. What I have said with reference to the rural route inspectors has reference to their riding upon the trains everywhere in the discharge of official duty, and the same with reference to post-office inspectors.
Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.
Mr. CLAY. I think this is a very important point. Has the Senator any information from the Post-Office Department as to how they would construe this proposed law in regard to the future action of the Department in permitting the railway mail clerks to ride free of cost?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was coming to that in the course of discussion when the interruptions occurred. It has become the custom for the railway companies to transport these employees of the Post-Office Department. They are furnished with cards into which are worked in some way the likeness of the railway postal clerk, and he is enabled thereby to be identified and allowed to ride back and forth upon trains between the runs that he makes and his home.
But the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department says that there is no provision under which they are able to exact this transportation from the railway companies, and in the face of a sweeping declaration that no passes shall be given to anybody they fear at the Post-Office Department that they would be denied the right which they are now granted by the railroad companies of transporting these employees. If the Department should be compelled to pay for this transportation it would impose upon the Post-Office Department an expenditure of something like a million dollars a year.
Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.
Mr. BAILEY. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] that this is a matter well worth the consideration of the Senate, but it is not a matter within the jurisdiction of the conference committee. The Senate provision in respect to passes did not except railway mail clerks. The House provision does not except the railway mail clerk, because it excepts no class. So there being nothing in either the Senate or the House provision in that respect, it looks to me like the matter is beyond the jurisdiction of the conference committee.
Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.
Mr. TILLMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will say to the Senator from Texas there was no provision placed in the bill by the House in regard to passes at all, and what is in the conference report is the substitute proposed by the House conferees, not by the House, and submitted and agreed on by both; and that, if accepted, will leave the situation exactly like it is now until the 1st of next January. In the meantime Congress will have until January to take up the whole question of free passes and free transportation and pass whatever kind of law it wants. It was with a view to postponing action and to get relief from the disagreement that the drastic provision which was brought in here was incorporated, because it does not go into effect until the 1st of January.
Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Wyoming?
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.
Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask a question of the Senator who has just taken his seat. Does the Senator in charge of the conference report believe that he is allowing time enough to consider this question? He speaks of Congress assembling in the fall, and the provision is to go into effect the 1st of January.
Mr. TILLMAN. I say the existing law will remain in effect until the 1st of January. This drastic provision, which prohibits passes to all people, will not go into effect until the 1st of January. I suppose there will be time between the meeting of Congress on the first Monday of December and the adjournment for the Christmas holidays to provide for the passes that people think ought to be allowed. Since we have been told to go back and fix this thing up, the conferees might postpone the time for this law to go into effect until the 4th day of March, and give us the entire winter—the whole of next session—to fix it up to the satisfaction of the country. We do not in the bill, if it becomes a law as the conferees report it, interfere in the slightest degree with existing conditions this year.
Mr. WARREN. But the Senator from Pennsylvania made a very good case in stating that it does interfere with existing conditions.
Mr. TILLMAN. The trouble with the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is a great lawyer, is, I think, that he is entirely technical on that ground. I do not believe the courts would hold it so, and I would be glad to have some of the other lawyers here examine those provisions and see whether they think they apply to passes.

Mr. WARREN. We had better not take the chances.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I must decline to yield further. Before I conclude I wish to present the opinion of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department.

With respect to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I am not positive that it is within the province of the conference committee to deal with this question. But it does seem to me that when they have the whole subject under consideration the question of the elimination of one class, or the addition of another class to the excepted classes already embraced in the section would be within their province. Whatever the fact may be, this matter is of such great importance to the Government that I felt warranted in taking the time of the Senate to make this statement. If there is any doubt about the power of the conferees to insert such a provision as will protect the Post-Office Department against the loss of a million dollars to the railroad companies, that doubt should be resolved in favor of the Government.

The statement which I have here from the Assistant Attorney-General is not the letter referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, which, he states, was before the conferees. They had no letter, as I am informed, from the Assistant Attorney-General. This is an informal statement of his opinion taken down over the telephone upon yesterday and verified by him this morning. He says:

I have not looked into the question, and the opinion I give is merely offhand. It is a question whether the Government could make a contract with the railroads which would require the roads to carry its railway mail clerks, inspectors, and other employees over the lines free in the event of a sweeping provision forbidding the issuance of all free transportation being passed as a part of the interstate-commerce act.

The law fixes the amount of compensation which shall be paid the railroads for carrying the mails. When the railroads undertake to carry the mails they understand that it must be carried under the provisions of the law and the regulations of the Department. One of these regulations is that mail clerks in the performance of their duty or going to and from their domicile shall be carried over the lines free. This is not a part of the law. It is a regulation, and while in a sense it is a contract, it imposes a duty not imposed by the law. I believe that the passage of a sweeping clause forbidding the giving of free transportation would at least render it doubtful if the Government could demand this service of the railroads and that it is probable it would have to pay for the transportation of all of these employees.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit me just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I expressed the opinion a moment ago that this matter was beyond the jurisdiction of the conferees. I was led to express that opinion by treating the conference report as the House provision; but on reflection, and in view of the fact that the House said nothing about limiting the right to issue passes, and that the Senate limited it to certain classes, I think the conferees clearly would have the right to include additional exceptions, if they chose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me that in the discussion of free transportation the Senate is drifting very far from the question that is properly before it. The Senate has already passed upon the question by an almost overwhelming vote in favor of the elimination of free passes with certain exceptions which the Senate considered matters of public policy and matters of humanity.

The only question that is before the Senate to-day, so far as this discussion is concerned, is whether the conferees will uphold, so far as they are able to do, the almost unanimous decision of the Senate with reference to transportation. The argument that has been made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], clear and agreeable and elucidating as it necessarily was, is something that has already been thrashed out on this floor. The Senate has agreed with him by its vote that free transportation should not be granted to delegates to conventions of either party. It has decided by a vote that free transportation should not be given to Members of Congress, to the judiciary, or to executive officers.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. That matter has been settled once by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator claim that anything that is in the bill as it left the Senate will prevent any railroad company from giving free transportation within a State, transportation confined to a particular State?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think it does, and I do not think we are liable to pass anything of that kind.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then how has the Senate declared that there will be no free transportation given by a railway company to members of a convention?

Mr. McCUMBER. It has declared generally against free transportation to anyone, so far as it has authority to make a law on the subject. That is all that either of us can claim. The Senator certainly does not suppose that I would for a moment contend that Congress should pass a law that the railroads could not grant a pass from one point in a State to another point in the same State, provided there was no State law against it. But so far as it can correct the evils it has sought to do so in recommending the passage of a bill limiting the use of free transportation.

The only question is, Shall the conference committee uphold the decision of the Senate upon that subject? I disagree absolutely with the Senator from Colorado, that we ought to increase the restrictions beyond what were made by the Senate in its vote a few days ago. If the Senator was driving into the city in his carriage and should see a cripple, he would either take him in his carriage and take him to the city, or he would send an ambulance for him. I do not think the Senator would regard it as a crime, for which he ought to be punished, because he acted under those natural impulses of humanity. If the Senator would not vote to punish himself, I know of no reason why he should vote to punish a railway company because they were influenced by the same humanitarian principles.

Now, that is all that the people ask to be done upon that subject. We wish the law, as we stated that we want it to pass, and to have it become a law, as was evidenced by the vote here a few days ago.

Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to another matter, to the words "willfully and knowingly;" and I especially invite the attention of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], if he is here.

Mr. CULLOM. He has gone.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator fully to understand what it means to strike out the word "knowingly," at least. I have no objection to striking out the word "willfully," but I again call attention to the provision on page 17. This applies not only to the carrier, but it applies to the shipper, and I will read that portion of it which applies to the shipper. It will read as follows:

In construing and enforcing the provisions of this section, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for the shipper, within the scope of his employment, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such shipper as well as that of the person.

The shipper is made a party to the action, and his action is also made criminal if he accepts a greater or a less sum than the schedule rates. A man from Montana, with a carload of cattle, will go to the agent and get the cost of transporting that carload of cattle, weighing a certain number of pounds, to the Chicago or to the St. Paul stock yards. If he makes an error, the shipper is responsible. Would the Senator say for one moment that this shipper, relying upon the statement that is given him as to the cost of transportation, should be held in a criminal action and imprisoned because of an error committed by some one else?

If that be true, and no one will deny it, why should we not insert there the word "knowingly?" I call the Senator's attention simply to that one phase without going over the other phases which have already been discussed here to-day.

I want to say a word, Mr. President, before closing, in answer to the statements made by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] upon the amount of salary to be received by these Commissioners. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that this extra salary is not for the benefit of the Commissioners, but that it is a matter of public interest. I will agree with him there, that the salaries in all instances are for the most part matters of public interest.

Mr. SPOONER. In theory.

Mr. McCUMBER. In theory; yes. I think the Senator will agree with me that the salary should always be such a sum as will insure for the position a class of men who can properly fill it. I think the Senator will probably agree with me that we should not go beyond that; that that should be the limit of determining what should be a fair salary to be paid officers in any official place.

Mr. President, would these Commissioners, of whom the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] speaks so highly—and I agree with him entirely in what he has said—resign their position if we did not increase their salary $2,500 beyond what they are receiving at the present time?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if it is not a fact that the present salary induced Judge Cooley, of Michigan, who was regarded as the ablest constitutional judge and lawyer of his age, to accept a position on the Commission?

Mr. McCUMBER. That may be, Mr. President. Judge Cooley occupied the bench, as the Senator from Illinois knows——

Mr. HOPKINS. Judge Cooley, who is a recognized authority on constitutional questions——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Judge Cooley accepted a position at the present salary; and if he would accept, what reason is there now for increasing the salary in order to procure able men? Is not that an evidence that the ablest men in the country would accept the position?

Mr. McCUMBER. I had in my notes the name of Judge Cooley, and was going to speak of him in a moment. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will agree that Judge Cooley was one of the greatest judges in the United States, well qualified to fill that position, and he filled it with honor in the very beginning, when the powers of the Commission were not well defined or well understood. If we could get such a man then, why can we not get the same character of men at the present time?

Mr. GALLINGER. And if the Senator from North Dakota will permit me, during those years the Interstate Commerce Commission made rates.

Mr. McCUMBER. In either instance, whether they made the rates or not, they were compelled, under the law at that time, to determine what were reasonable and just rates; and if we make a rate, they will have to investigate the same subjects now to determine what is a just and reasonable rate, and it will require no greater mental power to do that in the future than it has required to do it in the past.

Mr. HOPKINS. In other words, the conditions, if this bill becomes a law, will be practically what they were when Judge Cooley was induced to accept the position with a salary of $7,500 a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the same qualifications will be required. I know, Mr. President, that Senators who have represented great corporate interests, who have lived in the atmosphere of great fees, somehow seem to feel that we can not get men qualified to fill these great positions unless they receive such salaries as are paid by a few great corporations, who are able to pay enormous fees; and that their compensation must be based on the compensation paid to the attorneys of these great corporations. I do not think that that is a fair standard of measurement for the qualification of men to fill these positions. I believe to-day the Senator from Wisconsin could go into his own State and pick out half a hundred men who are receiving a compensation as practicing attorneys of less than $7,000 per annum who would be the equal of any one of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners who are occupying those positions to-day. I believe that that is true in every State in the Union. The amount of earning capacity of the average lawyer in the United States is less than $1,500. In that we take in a great army of people, I admit, who are hardly competent to fill a position of this kind. Those who receive enormous salaries are those who are located in the great cities and who generally have some important corporate interests to look after, and those become, by reason of their training, specialists, and not general practitioners. I believe that we need the general practitioner for this character of work.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin also stated as a reason why we could get splendid judges to fill the circuit bench for $7,000 a year that those were life positions. That is not the reason, Mr. President. I think we could get just as good judges if they were given simply a seven-years' term, as is provided in this bill for the Interstate Commerce Commissioners. The Secretary of State does not hold a life position, and we have been able to get such men as John Hay in that position; and I might go through a great number of names of men who are accepting $8,000 for a position of that kind. We can fill those positions. The Secretary of the Interior to-day has five times the amount of work to do of the character imposed upon him that could be possibly imposed even upon this great Commission, in looking after the internal affairs of the entire country. We have good men in such positions and we will continue to get proper men in all such honorable positions.

We get good men in the United States Senate, and we get them for $5,000 a year, although their necessary expenses in traveling and otherwise are many times greater than the expenses of these Commissioners.

But some Senator may say, "You are in favor of raising the salaries of Senators and Representatives." True, but it is not for the purpose of getting better men, because I do not think we could get men one atom better or better qualified to fill the position because of the increase of the salary; but I believe we should do a simple act of justice and make the salary commensurate with the position and the expenses that the incumbent of the office has necessarily imposed upon him.

Mr. President, my attention has been called very lately to the case of an attorney who received $30,000 for drawing up an instrument of incorporation and of association, which was to protect certain of the great corporate interests of the country. I believe it took a $3,000 clerk to find fault enough in that instrument to destroy it; certainly it took only an $8,000 Attorney-General to determine that it was not good in law and would not stand any legal test.

All this, Mr. President, simply demonstrates the fact that we are not always going to get such a wonderfully higher grade of intelligence and of intellectuality by increasing the salary that is to be paid to an incumbent of an office in any particular instance.

The present circuit judges, as I have stated before, must pass upon all of the matters that are passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It certainly requires as great intelligence, as great a lawyer, as great a man to oversee the work of the Commission as is required to perform the duties of that Commission. If that be true, then the same principle that would demand that we pay $10,000 or $15,000 to the members of the Commission would also demand that we pay $15,000 or $20,000 to the judges of the circuit court.

We can fill these positions, Mr. President, and there are thousands of men in every State who could be selected who are well qualified to fill them, and who would fill them for that salary, and—what is far more than the salary, ten times over to them—the honor of the position and the good that they could do to humanity.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a word, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I was antagonizing the proposition of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], which he announced here this afternoon and which he has announced hitherto, that he is indisposed to increase salaries in special cases of Government officials until there could be a general readjustment of salaries of those who are in the Federal public service.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wish he would go a little further and state that that is upon the assumption on my part that, as long as the salaries remained as they are now at the present plane, that plane must be accepted as the recognized and correct standard of salaries; and so long as that standard is recognized as correct, as illustrated by the salaries of Senators, Representatives, and judges of the courts, there ought not to be a departure from it in the fixing of high salaries for particular individuals, until, by undertaking to thus reform the whole, we should recognize that the present standard of salaries is wrong.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia states in different language precisely the idea which I have imputed to him, and I do not agree with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest, Mr. President, and in a way appeal, to Senators to leave something that is involved in this bill undiscussed. There are important matters, about which there could well be differences of opinion, and as to which there has been shown to exist a very radical difference of opinion here. The conferees have had sufficient advice and admonition and enlightenment; but the Senate will remember that the House passed this provision by a unanimous vote, lacking only seven, which the Senate conferees accepted, and that the Senate conferees induced the House conferees to accept practically all the Senate amendments. I think that the question of the salary, which was fixed by the House, might be left for a further conference by the conference committee of the two Houses, without entering into the merits of the question of salaries, the inadequacy of some and the excessive character of others. While, of course, I realize that Senators will continue to talk, as they have all day now, all day yesterday, and the day before, and will probably do so to-morrow, I beg, out of mercy for other business, that we do not continue to stir the water and agitate along all the lines in this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina has utterly wasted about three minutes of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I was aware that the Senator would say what he pleased in his own time. I did not rise to address myself to him so much as to half a dozen other Senators who are waiting around here to get the floor as soon as he sits down. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I was saying that I do not agree with the Senator from Georgia, and I do not intend to take much time in what I have to say. I believe that the people of the United States, in all human probability, would justify, in the present condition of the nation, a readjustment of salaries. I believe that if the Senate and the House of Representatives should pass a bill properly adjusting the salaries of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, it would meet with general approval among the people of the United States. I estimate them in that way. But there has been no movement of consequence in either House to do that thing, and it is to the credit, Mr. President, I think, of the Senate and of the House that such is the fact, for a sense of delicacy has restrained the Senate and the House because they have the control of the public purse, and they are indisposed and have been, while realizing that the salaries paid are unjust, to vote money out of the Treasury into their own pockets. That, I think, is all that has stood in the way of a readjustment of the salaries of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives.

But, Mr. President, we ought to pay as much as is necessary to obtain for the public service the best ability that can be obtained for that service. Judge Cooley was a great lawyer, but Judge Cooley did not live in the day of great fees. His mind was not beclouded, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] suggests that mine is, by familiarity with the atmosphere of great corporations or the memory of great fees received from corporations. He was a student. I do not think Judge Cooley probably, situated as he was, could have made greater compensation in Michigan in the practice of the profession, for he had been a great many years on the bench and a writer of valuable law books. His line of work was largely in that direction. There is no possible similarity between the position of a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and a Federal judge, for reasons which I gave when I took the floor before.

Mr. President, my mind has not been influenced in the slightest in what I have said by a remembrance of great corporation fees. Twenty-two years ago, when I ceased to have any connection as a lawyer with a railway corporation, in connection with a general practice the compensation was trifling compared with what is paid in these days.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think probably, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, that he misunderstood my statement. I stated that there are many Senators—I did not say this Senator, that Senator, or any other—who live in an atmosphere where large fees are paid—I did not say to them or through them—and, of course, they will, naturally perhaps, have more of an idea of compensation being based upon those large fees than I would who have not lived in that atmosphere.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator was replying to my observations specifically, and his remark as it will appear in the RECORD would seem to be directed to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assure the Senator it was not so intended.

Mr. SPOONER. For twenty-two years, Mr. President, I have not received a dollar from any railroad corporation in the United States for any professional service or any other service, directly or indirectly, and during the last twenty-two years, while I have been a member of the Senate, I have not practiced my profession for any corporation, except to close up a case nearly finished when I was elected in 1896, and to advise a traction company in northern Wisconsin in one suit, or, to any appreciable extent, for individuals. But even though I had, Mr. President, I think I would still be capable as a Senator of studying, and studying alone, the public interests in attempting to legislate here as a servant of the people for the people.

Some of the salaries which we pay are manifestly inadequate. To-day no man but a rich man can represent the United States as an ambassador at London or at Paris, and, I might say, at St. Petersburg. It is a situation that should not remain. It is not creditable to this nation. Such a salary ought to be paid for those services as would make it possible for men of great ability, who have spent their lives in study and preparation to fit them for the discharge of such high duties, but who have not the money to enable them, at their own expense, either in whole or in part, to go there and work and do what is necessary to be done to properly represent this Government.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me if I interrupt him?

Mr. SPOONER. I want to finish in a few moments, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. President, take the Panama Canal. Apply the doctrines which are sought here to be applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission to the engineer to whom is intrusted the construction of the Panama Canal. You could not hire an engineer fit for that work for what is paid a Senator or for what is paid a Cabinet officer, or for $10,000 or $15,000 a year. Why? Because the Government of the United States is obliged to compete with the railway corporations of the United States in order to obtain the very best—for it must have the very best—engineering talent available in this country which can be obtained. Even with the salary now paid, the honor of the position, and the prospect of having one's name connected with that great work alone enable us to secure a competent man.

Mr. President, perhaps this $7,500 salary is enough for the Interstate Commerce Commissioners. I do not criticise the Commission as it is, but I think we have had some men on that Commission since its creation who did not seem to me men I would have chosen for that place. They are liable at the end of their terms to be displaced; they are subject to removal during their terms. It is a place which has, in its tenure, vicissitudes. It is a place somewhat dependent upon other wills than their own, and it is difficult to find a lawyer in good practice, if you deal only with a lawyer, who will abandon his practice, leave his home, scatter his clients, and come to Washington to spend five years or six years or seven years, and be liable at any time to go out and to hunt a new practice and to build up again. Every sensible man takes that into account. And, Mr. President, as I said before, we are placing upon these men great responsibility.

There ought to be a good traffic man on this Commission, a man familiar with the traffic business of the country; a man who knows from experience with railroad corporations the weak spots, who knows how to get at the truth, who is an expert. You can not expect to get such a man unless you approximate at least the salaries paid to such men by the railway corporations. I think this is about the most expensive city in the United States, except, perhaps, New York, for a man to live.

Talk about the honor of the place. The best men who would be attracted by this position would not come simply for the good they could do the country during a term, it may be shorter or longer. They do not want to come here at a sacrifice to themselves and to their families. It is a great work. It is full of complexity and difficulty, and the Commissioners ought to have good pay. I myself should be perfectly willing to vote, feeling that I voted in the interest of the people and all the people, to attach to these positions a salary which would make the place attractive to men fitted by experience and study and ability for the duties and willing to take the office. That is the basis upon which I advocate a fairly good salary to these Commissioners, and that is wise and beneficent expenditure of the public money.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in view of the appeal made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] for haste and a final vote on the conference report, I shall occupy but a few moments, and shall speak upon one part of the bill only, and that the antipass amendment.

It seems to me, if we can judge from the atmosphere of this Chamber, that there is not a Senator who does not believe that the employees of railroads should have free transportation for themselves and their families, and the conferees must insist upon this to the very end and until accomplished. I do not believe it will be denied by a single Senator that men in charge of live stock traveling over the roads should also have free transportation.

It seems to me that the Senate's antipass amendment, agreed to very nearly unanimously in the Senate, should be now adhered to in preference to the one that is presented by the conference report, or in preference to leaving the bill with no provision in regard to the pass question.

The live-stock men are not alone interested in the matter of free transportation for those accompanying stock. The railroads also are interested; but, most of all, the consumers of meat products are interested. These are pretty strenuous times just now in the endeavor to cleanse and purify everything relating to our meat products. It is a time when all the sensitiveness and all the examinations and investigations, no matter what may be the good results that may follow, bears very heavily upon the live-stock grower. All of this excitement is lowering the price day by day of the live stock of this country.

It seems to me that under the circumstances we can not be too liberal toward the live-stock grower, nor can we be too careful in the way the stock is shipped to market.

Who, then, shall go with this live stock? Shall it be the pick ups and hoboes without experience that a railroad may be obliged to send, or shall it be those who have an interest in the stock? The men who accompany live stock do not ride for pleasure. They are there in their overalls and coarse clothing, riding on the freight trains with cattle, getting in the cattle cars at every station to care for them. It is a laborious and hard service. It is a service that no man wants for the sake of riding over a railroad, and is in no wise a favor or a discrimination for or against anyone. No man pleads for a pass to go with live stock, unless he has an interest in that stock.

So whatever the conference committee may do, it seems to me the owners or agents in charge of live stock should be put upon the plane of highest privilege as to transportation next to the railroad employees, and if there are any exceptions whatever to the prohibition of the issuance of passes they should be included, for, indeed, they are practically, for the time being, railroad employees.

Mr. President, the producer—the farmer—if I may use the simile, is always the "under dog." In a fight his back is upon the rock, with the weight of the world upon his breast. All the pressure, the wear and tear, and the tug of war of the business world comes upon one side, with no give way or relief on the other. The consumer wants low prices and bears down upon the retailer; the retailer bears down upon the wholesaler; the wholesaler upon the manufacturer, and the manufacturer upon the raw material, and there is where the farmer—the producer—is caught. Whatever is done in injury of the matter of meat products the poor farmer gets the entire weight of the burden and has the losses to bear.

I noticed just now in the afternoon paper some testimony that is being taken in another place in the Capitol, and I will ask the Secretary to read the paragraph I have marked. It is a statement under oath of the manager of one of the great slaughtering establishments, Mr. Wilson, and it tells the results of the present agitation concerning the packing houses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The results have been disastrous," he said. "The sale of fresh and manufactured products has been more than cut in two. Every country in Europe has taken up the agitation. It is hurting us very materially. Other countries that produce in competition are taking advantage of it. They will get the benefit and we stand the losses. I hate to think what the ultimate results will be if we are cut out of the foreign trade. We will not be able to handle the stock that raisers and farmers send us, and I don't know how we are to avoid a terrible calamity in the Western country at least."

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman who gave that testimony is speaking what he believes to be the truth. He is speaking of what the indications seem to prove, that all this cleaning house that we are engaged in, and to which I am not now objecting, is putting the farmer and his product in jeopardy for at least the present season, and it seems to me this is the wrong time to take away from the stock grower that which he has always enjoyed—the privilege of protecting his own stock when it is in shipment—and also taking away the best protection we have for our meat product while it is en route from the pastures to the shambles. We ought to afford to the consumers of meat every precaution and protection possible, which will include the proper care while the product is thus on the way from its feeding grounds to the slaughtering pens.

So, Mr. President, I plead for the free transportation, going and coming, of those who accompany live stock in whatever may be done regarding this antipass amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was rejected.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and request a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Vice-President be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. CULLOM as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had given notice that if the rate bill was disposed of at a reasonable hour I would call up the District of Columbia appropriation bill; but the hour is so late that I now suggest to the Senate that after the routine morning business to-morrow I will ask consideration for that bill.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask the Senate to dispose of the bill with reference to Niagara. It will not take more than a few moments to dispose of it, and I should be very glad to get it out of the way.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me to make a statement?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I simply wish to get this bill read and disposed of. However, I yield to the Senator from Minnesota to make a statement.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the report of the conferees on the Indian appropriation bill was filed two weeks ago to-day. There has been no opportunity seemingly to take it up. I wish to give notice that I shall ask for its consideration immediately on the conclusion of the action of the Senate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

PRESERVATION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. LODGE. I now ask to take from the Calendar for consideration the bill (H. R. 18024) for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes. It is a House bill which has been unanimously reported by our committee. I think it will not delay the Senate longer than to read it. There is an amendment of the committee, and two other amendments are to be offered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, in section 3, page 4, line 11, after the word "prohibited," to insert "as well as any diversion of water or transmission of power in violation hereof;" in line 13, after the word "enforced," to insert "or enjoined at the suit of the United States;" in line 14, after the word "by," to strike out the words "the order of;" and in line 14, after the word "court," to strike out "exercising" and insert "having;" so as to make the clause read:

And, further, the removal of any structures or parts of structures erected in violation of this act, or any construction incidental to or used for such diversion of water or transmission of power as is herein prohibited, as well as any diversion of water or transmission of power in violation hereof, may be enforced or enjoined at the suit of the United States by any circuit court having jurisdiction in any district in which the same may be located, and proper proceedings to this end may be instituted under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I would be glad to know from what committee the bill comes.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a unanimous report. The matter was long before us. We had hearings on the bill. I am not aware that there is any question about it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the word "river," in line 25, page 4, section 4, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to hold or concede that the waters of Lake Michigan or other lakes or rivers wholly within the territory of the United States are subject of international negotiation.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I presume that this is the bill to preserve Niagara Falls.

Mr. LODGE. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure, inasmuch as it comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations with a unanimous report, that the subject must be within the jurisdiction of Congress. But I want to know whether the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject results from the fact that the river is a navigable stream or because it is an international boundary.

Mr. LODGE. Because it is an international boundary, and it requires negotiations in order to settle it. The bill is limited to three years, in order to give opportunity for the negotiations to proceed. The river is a navigable stream above the falls.

Mr. BAILEY. I could not quite comprehend the purpose of providing in this, which seems to be merely a law and has no element of contract in it, that this proposed act may be altered, modified, or repealed.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose that is because the negotiations may occur and be completed before the expiration of the three years.

A treaty would naturally supersede it. I do not think the seventh section is necessary. It came from the House, and I did not think——

Mr. BAILEY. It would not be necessary, because if this matter shall be made the subject of a treaty, the treaty would repeal the law.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty would absolutely supersede it.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no disposition to find fault with the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. A great many permits for the use of water, on our side, will be granted to citizens of New York, upon which investments will be made, and it is well enough to reserve the power.

Mr. KNOX. I propose the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, after the word "use," it is proposed to insert the following:

Or contracted to be used in factories, the buildings of which are now in process of construction.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that applies to only one case of a factory which is now completed, practically, and the committee would have no objection to it, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLESTON LIGHT AND WATER COMPANY.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8410) to authorize the Charleston Light and Water Company to construct and maintain a dam across Goose Creek, in Berkeley County, in the State of South Carolina.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUARTEL LOT, MONTEREY, CAL.

Mr. FLINT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16946) releasing the right, title, and interest of the United States to the piece or parcel of land known as the "Cuartel lot" to the city of Monterey, Cal., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 8, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 7, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, and, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, was approved.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint special committee be appointed, consisting of five Senators to be appointed by the Vice-President, and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the revision and codification of laws prepared by the statutory revision commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States; and that the said joint committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress and to employ necessary clerical assistance, to order such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business, and to incur such expense as may be necessary, all such expense to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this, when the codification commission have made a full and complete report and the matter is now on the Calendar of the House?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will bear in mind that the only report that is before the House, the only completed bill that has been reported, is the one involving the criminal code. The great mass of the substantive law which was committed to this commission to revise and codify has not yet been reported to this House. The House will fully understand that this work is a very large one, and that before it can be enacted into law it must pass both the House and the Senate.

Immediately upon our appointment, at the present session of Congress, in obedience to a resolution of our committee I entered into correspondence with the Senate committee in order to bring about joint action. Owing to the fact that the chairman of that committee was absent and ill, it was impossible for us to get any joint action. Our committee have proceeded earnestly and industriously during this entire session of Congress——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does this resolution provide for a continuation of the present commission that was appointed to revise the laws, or for the abolishment of that commission?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I want to say that it does not in itself have any effect upon that commission; but I want also to say to the gentlemen of the House that our Committee on the Revision of the Laws this morning, by resolution, authorized me, as chairman of that committee, to introduce a bill into the present Congress abolishing that commission. The object of this looks to the consummation of the work, which will bring to a conclusion the duties of that commission.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why not put a provision in this resolution abolishing that commission if we are to appoint another commission now to take the place of that one?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. You are not appointing another commission; you are appointing a joint committee of the two Houses, which simply represents the revision committee of the Senate and the revision committee of this House. This is not a new commission.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then let this resolution stand until you abolish that commission.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Our thought with regard to that was this: We discussed that very earnestly this morning. We believed it to be wise to submit that matter to the joint committee contemplated in this resolution and that we ought to consult with the committee to be appointed by the Senate before we definitely take that action. This committee is as anxious as any individual Members of this Congress can be to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is it the purpose of this commission to take the code already prepared by the commission that has been at work for about ten years, or to go over all of the work again and get up a new revision?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Let me say to the gentleman that this is not to be a commission; it is only a joint committee of the two Houses, the object being to facilitate the work that must be done by the respective committees of the two Houses. Now, we propose, of course, to take the work of the commission, to go over it, and to embody it in the form of bills to be presented and passed by Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. This is a commission to revise the criminal and civil statutes, is it not?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The existing commission is a commission employed by Congress——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand, but is it not your purpose to have this committee that you provide for revise both the civil and criminal laws?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The purpose is to consider the work of the commission.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To revise the revision, in other words?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. To put the work of the commission into bills that will be submitted to this House and to the Senate for the purpose of being enacted into law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And with the right to revise and change?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No; we do not give to this commission——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then why do you have a committee, if you have no right to revise and change?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will understand that all this work goes back before the committee. I want to say that the existing commission has interpreted its powers very broadly and that it has included a great deal of new law in their report that this committee do not feel they have a right to recommend.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not let the two Houses of Congress handle this work?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will understand that it would be utterly impracticable to do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to make a statement, perhaps I can simplify this somewhat.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know a little more about this before we pass the objections made.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say to the House that at the last——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have not withdrawn my reservation of the right to object yet.

Mr. SHERLEY. I desire to say to the House that at the last session of Congress, in the closing days of that Congress, there was passed, on my motion, a resolution authorizing the Commission to report finally at this session of Congress. I then said to the House that I was in favor of the abolition of this Commission, and that I would do what I could to bring its labors to a close. I want to say to the House now that this resolution looks to the carrying out of the pledge I then made upon the floor. The purpose of this resolution is to appoint a committee consisting of five Senators and five Representatives, who will work during the recess of Congress——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then why not appoint these ten men from the two committees, five from the Senate committee and five from the House committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. This leaves it optional with the Speaker of the House and with the President of the Senate to appoint any five members of the respective bodies. I have no doubt there will be appointed men from the two Committees on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How were the statutes revised heretofore? Has this course ever been adopted for revising the laws heretofore?

Mr. SHERLEY. As I understand it, there has always been cooperation between the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate. The gentleman will understand that in regard to the judicial code, for instance, there is a change made that is fundamental. Now, it is possible that the House committee and the House might act along certain lines that might not at all meet with the concurrence of the Senate; and this being work of a technical character, it seemed to the members of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the House that by getting the two committees together and having them consult together the result of their labors could be brought into the respective Houses with some fair chance of getting final legislation during the short session.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is there not a Committee on the Revision of the Laws in the Senate as well as in the House?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is; but the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the Senate would not begin its labors until after the House had acted.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me a moment now. In the short session that is coming it would be practically impossible for this House to consider independently the report of its committee and then have it go over to the Senate as entirely new matter and be considered by them in time to pass before final adjournment. With the idea of facilitating action, it was thought that if the two Houses had their two committees work together the result of their joint labor might produce a bill that could be put through within the short session by both bodies, and so the labors of the committees would not come to naught. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why not put it through at this session?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman has substantially answered the question that I wanted to ask. It seems to me that with only a short session of this Congress remaining we can not expect committees in both Houses to act upon this great mass of reports that have come in from this revisory Commission. So by the adoption of this resolution you get the two committees at work together during the vacation, and by the time Congress meets for the short session it can be reported to one House or the other, I take it to this House, acted upon promptly and sent to the Senate.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was the idea involved; and I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri, because when the matter was up last year he interrogated me in regard to the life of this Commission, that there was upon my motion to-day adopted in the Committee on the Revision of the Laws a resolution instructing the chairman of that committee to introduce a bill at this session abolishing the Commission on the 1st of October of this year.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Why not attach that to this resolution and abolish it on the adoption of this resolution?

Mr. SHERLEY. In the judgment of the committee, it is thought advisable to put through this resolution, and then in the draft of that bill to make a proper provision in regard to having some man who had been familiar with all the Commission's work, subject to the orders of the joint committee of the House and Senate. I can assure the gentleman from Missouri that a bill will be introduced and will be favorably reported at once by the committee and brought upon the floor for the abolition of that Commission.

Mr. DE ARMOND. But that is as far as the assurance can go.

Mr. MANN. What about the appropriation for the Commission?

Mr. SHERLEY. The appropriation is a continuing one and would go on forever without some action of Congress.

Mr. MANN. We make appropriations for it every year.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. In the act creating the Commission it was provided that the payment should be made out of the funds in the Treasury from year to year. It will require affirmative action to abolish the Commission.

Mr. MANN. I think we have been making appropriations for the Commission ever since I have been in the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The Commission is paid through the Attorney-General's department. The assurance which the gentleman from Kentucky gives, goes to the favorable reporting of the bill, and necessarily it can go no further. Why, if this Commission is to be abolished, not abolish it by the resolution providing for the joint committee?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not think the two pieces of legislation ought to be separated.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that it is doubtful whether by such a resolution you can repeal the act creating this Commission. It ought to be done by a bill properly drawn and passed.

Mr. DE ARMOND. A joint resolution would do it.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to suggest that the joint special committee which will be appointed may desire to have the right to consider what should be done with the records, and make suggestions as to what should be done with reference to reports on the work of the Commission and as to their need of its services and the time of their termination.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is very well, but Congress ought to be done with the Commission.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest, we are framing legislation every day that will go into this revision, and this Commission can put that into proper shape to be enacted in the report of the joint committee. There is a great deal of that work to be done yet.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I can not take that view of it. In view of the fact that they have been eight or ten years at work and have not done more than three respectable lawyers could do in six months with a proper clerical assistance, it seems to me that it does not have much fruitfulness in it as to what is to be in the future. The Commission ought to have been abolished long ago.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that he is no more desirous of bringing about that result than I am. I am ready to do all I can, and if the gentleman will bear with us he will see results in a few days in that regard.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not think so. I think it will take all the push and power behind this resolution, with all the power and influence to get rid of that Commission, which is practically a useless thing and has been for years and years, and it is likely to continue a useless and expensive Commission for years and years to come.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I object, Mr. Speaker, unless the propositions are coupled together.

PRINTING DIGEST AND MANUAL.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and the Clerk of the House.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed to investigate the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane be authorized to have such printing done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary in the transaction of its business.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

JOINT RESOLUTION SUPPLYING DEFICIENCIES IN APPROPRIATIONS FOR ASSISTANT JANITORS AND CUSTODIANS OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to submit the following joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota reports the following joint resolution from the Committee on Appropriations, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services in connection with the care of public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the receiving of this report. I make the point of order that it is not a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from New York this matter came to the committee's attention this morning, and more than a majority of the committee were present, and the gentlemen present, including the gentleman from Georgia, who is the ranking member of the minority of the subcommittee which has charge of deficiency appropriations. I also spoke to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and was looking for the gentleman from New York. Had I known the necessity of this, I would have called a meeting of the committee, but a majority of the committee were there and considered it and authorized the chairman to report it to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Minnesota to report the resolution from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have; by direction of the committee.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman makes the point of order——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand, Mr. Speaker, it is not the report of the committee, but it is the report——

The SPEAKER. It is a question of fact, and the Chair would ask the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. TAWNEY. I said the committee directed me to report it, a majority of the committee being present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Was the committee called together to consider this matter?

Mr. TAWNEY. It was; but not formally called together.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order, if the committee was not formally called together——

The SPEAKER. But a majority of the committee were there, and directed the gentleman to report the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Informally, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Was a majority present?

Mr. TAWNEY. A majority was present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and I wish to say this——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 150, noes 43.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the regular order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withhold my motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the naval appropriation bill on the Speaker's table, and ask unanimous consent——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demanded the regular order, and I insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my motion. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills reported from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that there is a motion pending to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his motion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I modified my motion.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. TAWNEY. I call up for consideration the joint resolution which was sent to the Clerk's desk a few moments ago and has been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations, which the Clerk will report.

The joint resolution was again reported.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, about two months ago the Secretary of the Treasury informed the Committee on Appropriations that there would be a deficiency in the current appropriations for assistant janitors and custodians of Government buildings throughout the United States. At that time it was understood that this deficiency would be carried in the general deficiency appropriation bill. The Secretary of the Treasury this morning informed the committee that the appropriation will be exhausted in about seven days from to-day, and that unless this deficiency appropriation can be obtained at once, by the 15th day of this month the elevators in the Government buildings outside the District of Columbia will cease to run, and that the Government buildings will have to be closed, so far as the service of the elevators is concerned; and that is the necessity for getting prompt action in respect to the appropriation for this deficiency. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, while in the Treasury building yesterday the Treasury officials brought this deficiency to my notice. It involves every public building, north and south, east and west in the janitor and elevator service, and with only seven days to get an appropriation through the House and the Senate and thus become available, it should be taken up this morning. As to the committee meeting, to which my friend objected, I did not know that he was not present, and I am not responsible for his absence. Gentlemen of the House, this appropriation must be made to keep the courts of the country going, and to do so, it must be made available by the 15th of this month or the janitor service and the elevator service of the buildings will stop, public business will stop.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is there any reason on earth why this should not pass now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. None.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, then, let us vote upon it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Why was it omitted from the sundry civil bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It does not belong there. It ordinarily would have been provided for in the general deficiency bill, and we thought we would have plenty of time to do that, but we now know that it would be too late to make the appropriation, and hence this resolution. That is all there is to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say this with reference to this matter——

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yielded him a moment.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yielded to you.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say with reference to this resolution that it may be all right, so far as I know, and it may be all wrong. I protested against the ruling of the Speaker a few minutes ago and attempted to get the floor to explain to the House why I did not believe the Speaker's ruling on this proposition was right. The Speaker recognized the gentleman from Minnesota instead of myself, and of course I had no opportunity to say what I intended to say. Now, I merely desire to put this into the RECORD. There is no protection to the individual Member of this House, if you will allow the chairman of a committee and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to call together such members of a committee as they desire to report a resolution to this House without notification or a committee meeting.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I want to correct the gentleman. I know of my own personal knowledge that the chairman of the committee did not do this. He did not select members, as the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that he did in this instance; but if he can call together at his beck and call a majority of the committee without giving notice of a committee meeting, why, then the object of committees is entirely abolished. If a gentleman is a member of a committee that would object to legislation, you can pass it through the House and through the committee without ever giving notice to him whatever. The rules of this House contemplate that when a committee passes on legislation that committee should be called together and notice given, and I say when the Speaker recognizes a gentleman to call up a resolution here as a report of a committee that has not been passed on by a committee regularly called together and notified to come together he violates the rules of this House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the gentleman's own committee has done that very thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, they did it by unanimous consent.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for three minutes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my colleague on the committee from New York, and with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that as a matter of practice and of sound policy all matters should be called first to the attention of committees regularly called together; but there are times when we can afford to make a slight sacrifice of principle in order to accomplish some practical result, and in this case no harm will result if we do that. I think that the chairman of the committee proceeded in a practical way to do a necessary thing, and I wish to say, further, that while I am not usually sparing in my criticisms of my political opponents, I would be lacking in common decency if I did not say now that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has been eminently fair in his treatment of the minority members of that committee. That committee has not always had the reputation of treating the minority members fairly, but it is justly achieving that reputation this year. I am informed that in past years objectionable portions of hearings have been excluded upon the ipse dixit of the chairmen of committees. No such practice is tolerated by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. The utmost freedom in the expression of opinion and action is granted to the members of the minority. In fact, I can see no distinction whatever in the chairman's treatment of the members of that committee upon the grounds of politics. Therefore, while the criticism is a just one that committee meetings ought to be held, in this particular case nothing will result that is harmful by this slight concession of principle. A majority of the members of the committee were present. Some who were not present at the majority meeting were consulted later. All of the members of the committee who know the facts are aware that it is a just appropriation and that action ought to be taken now, and that it ought not to be delayed because of a useless sticking for principle upon a trifling occasion. I trust, therefore, that the action of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will be sustained by the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are times when occasions arise that would justify informal meetings of the committee for the purpose of reporting an emergency appropriation. The deficiency that this appropriation is to make up, however, is not a sudden or an emergent appropriation. It grows out of a palpable violation of the law by a Department of the Government. Last year there was a certain amount of money appropriation for janitor and custodian service in the Treasury Department. It was $45,000 less than the estimate submitted by the Department to Congress. When the urgent deficiency bill was up the Department requested that this $45,000 be given in order to do the work that it had contemplated, but that Congress had refused to approve, and the committee refused to incorporate the item in that bill, and very severely criticised those who were responsible for the failure to comply with the law which was enacted to prevent deficiencies in the service. As soon as those criticisms were made in the House officials in the Treasury Department singled out courthouses and customs-houses and public buildings in the districts of members upon the Committee on Appropriations and cut off the janitor service, in order apparently to show that if Members of Congress dared criticise these men in their violations of the law that they would show, by making trouble at home for them, that it was a dangerous thing to do. Since early in the year it has been known that $45,000 would be required in order to carry out this service in accordance with the estimate of the Department, and not until yesterday did my distinguished colleague from Georgia on the committee learn from the Department that this money would be needed, although he was one of the members of the committee who refused to grant this appropriation in the urgent deficiency bill. Mr. Chairman, I am not any more oversensitive as to my rights as a member of the committee than other members are. Resolutions providing moneys for the relief of the San Francisco sufferers were reported and passed here without objection or criticism, although there was no meeting of the committee. This is the third measure reported in the nature of an appropriation bill that should come up in the ordinary way that was never considered, and was reported without notice to the members of the Committee on Appropriations.

So far as I am concerned, I will pursue the same practice in the future. I am present here most of the time, and I am easily accessible to those whose duty it is to give notice of these meetings. I am fairly faithful in my attendance upon the committee, and at the meetings of the House, and so long as I am a member of the committee I propose that matters such as this shall not be passed upon informally, without some effort made at least to make the facts public. This resolution is necessary, because the members of this Administration violated the law. They flaunted an act of Congress in the face of Congress. They expended money, or proposed to expend money, not in accordance with what Congress had determined, but in accordance with the decision of the chief clerk of the Department to expend what he thought was necessary. Against that practice the committee, led by the chairman, protested, and I believe this resolution should not be passed without a similar protest being registered. And if possible, I believe that in some way those responsible for this deficiency should be punished as they deserve. It was a clear violation of a provision put on an appropriation bill to prevent deficiencies. Some method ought to be devised to punish those who violate the law. To the bill itself I have no objection. The money is required to carry on the public business. To the manner in which the bill comes before the House I do object, and I shall continue to express my disapproval with the practice at each recurrence of it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know by what authority the statement is made by my colleague on the committee from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the Treasury Department discriminated against Members of the House or the Committee on Appropriations who were opposed to making the necessary appropriations for janitors and custodians in these public buildings for the current year, but I understand that his main complaint now is that the Treasury Department did not apply the rule to Members who did not belong to the committee. He thinks that members of the committee ought to have been allowed to vote against the necessary appropriation and the Government still take care of the janitors and custodians in their court-houses and other public places, and for that reason he says he is opposed to making this appropriation now.

But I rose, Mr. Chairman, to say that this is an emergency appropriation. On the 15th of this month all over the country these janitors and custodians will have to be discharged and the public business crippled unless this action is promptly taken. It happened this morning that, information coming to the chairman of the committee, he gathered together and talked to as many of the members of the committee, of both political parties, as he could find, and as none of them suggested an objection, but all he saw of the committee united in assenting to the proposition and that the chairman should make the report at once, he therefore properly made it.

I wish to say that I myself am opposed to informal meetings without all members being notified, in all ordinary cases. I do not want a committee meeting when I am not present or am not notified to be present, but such emergencies as this have arisen all along through the history of Congress, and they are likely to arise again, and no censure can apply to our chairman in this case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did you get the information about this deficiency this morning?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Never got it before?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, we knew two months ago that there would be a deficiency, but we did not know that the current appropriation would be exhausted inside of seven or eight days from now. We intended to carry it on the general deficiency appropriation bill, but the fact that this appropriation will be completely exhausted before the general deficiency bill or the sundry civil bill can become a law makes it absolutely necessary that this emergency appropriation should be made now, in order to continue the service after the 15th of June.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will indulge me in another inquiry—I happened to be out of the Chamber when the gentleman first took the floor to explain this—is this the deficiency that caused the stoppage of the elevators in about forty of the custom-houses throughout the country?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman, and also at the same time answer the criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] on this subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to have the gentleman answer my question first.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this deficiency was presented to the Committee on Appropriations during the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. It appeared, however, that, although the Department had apportioned this appropriation at the beginning of this fiscal year, that apportionment had not been waived in accordance with the law, and there was therefore no reason assigned for the deficiency. The antideficiency law had not been complied with, and for that reason the committee refused to grant the appropriation at that time. Therefore, when the matter was again brought to the attention of the committee, the Department was informed that if they would waive the apportionment and give the committee the reasons for the waiver and the reasons assigned were satisfactory to the committee, the item would then be carried in the general deficiency appropriation bill. At that time it was expected the general deficiency bill would become a law before the 15th of June. Now, that can not be; and the fact that this appropriation will be exhausted before the general deficiency bill can pass it will necessitate shutting down all the elevators and the discontinuance of this service unless the appropriation is made at once.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has not pointedly answered my question. Has this deficiency anything to do with stopping the elevators in forty of the custom-houses and post-offices of the United States, which the gentleman knows I brought to his attention sixty or ninety days ago?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has this deficiency anything to do with that?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has.

Mr. KEIFER. It brings about the same result.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My good friend will remember that I conferred with him several times, and he informed me that he went down to the Treasury Department and used some rather warm language there, and he stated to me that he found they had the money, and he started the elevators in about a week, and I was very much obliged to him.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; they have a sufficient amount to continue the service until the 15th of June, and then there will be a deficiency of $45,000, or that additional amount will be necessary to continue the service until July 1. Now, upon our promise, in the event of their compliance with the antideficiency law, to carry the $45,000 deficiency in the general deficiency bill, the service was again reestablished and the elevators put in operation. But the appropriation necessary for that purpose, we were advised, will be exhausted by the 15th of June, or within seven days, and the same condition will exist that existed last spring, unless the Department can get the money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman went down and found that they did have the money to run the elevators, and that the elevators should not be stopped. Now the gentleman comes in and says that there is a deficiency, which the gentleman is now trying to cover.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, I do not think I made any statement that would justify him in reaching a conclusion of that kind. I said they had sufficient money to keep this service going until the 15th of June.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You made them start the elevators.

Mr. TAWNEY. They did start the elevators on the promise of the members of the committee that if they would comply with the antideficiency law we would carry the item of $45,000 to continue the service from the 15th of June to the 1st of July.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. If the Department had money sufficient to carry the work on until June 15, why did they stop it back in April?

Mr. TAWNEY. The reason for stopping it was this: They did not stop the entire service, but they had to reduce the expenditure in order to make the appropriation last until the 1st of July.

Mr. PADGETT. Why did they stop it in some places and continue it in others?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a matter the gentleman will have to go to the Treasury Department to find out. I do not know what rule they followed in discontinuing the service in one part of the country and not in another. Nevertheless it was necessary for them to do that if they were going to be limited until the 1st of July with the amount of the current appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. Does not the gentleman think it would have been better and more just and fair to have continued the service up until the exhaustion of the appropriation, and only close it down after the exhaustion of the appropriation?

Mr. TAWNEY. That the law would absolutely forbid. They could not use the money for the purpose of making a deficiency.

Mr. PADGETT. They could run the service up to the exhaustion of the fund and stop.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the law expressly forbids that. The antideficiency law prohibits that. The gentleman will recall, if he stops to think a moment, that during the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill there was considerable criticism, not only of this Department, but of all Departments, because they had not complied with the antideficiency law. In this particular case the appropriation had been apportioned, but the apportionment had not been waived, and the Department informed us that there would be a deficiency of $45,000 in this appropriation. We declined to encourage them in the nonobservance of the antideficiency law by refusing to give them that deficiency appropriation. Of course, there was some feeling created, doubtless, between the House and the Department in consequence of that fact. But after the bill had passed and the service had been dispensed with in certain places the Department conceded then that they had neglected to waive the apportionment and said they would waive it, and asked if the matter would be carried in the general deficiency bill, and we informed them that it would and the service was again restored.

Mr. PADGETT. The antideficiency law does not prohibit the use of all the money that has been appropriated for a specific purpose. It only prohibits the creation of a debt beyond the appropriation, and under the appropriation that was made the service could have been continued until June the 15th.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman either has not read the antideficiency law carefully or he is in error in regard to its construction.

Mr. PADGETT. If they run the service up to June the 15th and then stop, there would be no deficiency. There would be a lack of service, but they would only have used the money appropriated. Why did they stop in some districts and continue in other districts the service during the month of April when there was money enough to carry it up to the 15th of June?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can only repeat the statement I made to the gentleman a moment ago—that that is a question that he will have to address to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman if it does not occur to him that there was some favoritism and some disposition to visit punishment upon certain Members?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certain members of the Appropriation Committee?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and others.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know as to others, but I will say to the gentleman that if there was any favoritism of that kind it was not limited to one party in the committee, because members of both parties on the committee suffered alike.

Mr. PADGETT. I am not putting it on a party basis. I am calling attention to the fact that the departmental officer is proposing to punish Members of Congress for the exercise of his official function.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say in reply to that and in justification of the Department, that the Department submitted to the Committee on Appropriations a list of all buildings in which this service was in whole or in part dispensed with in consequence of the necessity of making the current appropriation last until the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman that list?

Mr. TAWNEY. That statement is on file in the Committee on Appropriations, and it covers some 200 or 300 cases.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman put that statement in the RECORD?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that I will put it in the RECORD, but I will give it to the gentleman in order that he can see where the places are where the service was diminished or entirely suspended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would be very glad to get it.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a lengthy statement and would be of no special benefit if it was placed in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will recollect that I called for the places and the gentleman at that time said that he hadn't got it, and I haven't got it yet. I would like to say——

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, let the gentleman go to the committee room and ask the clerk.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, if the gentleman will give me authority to go in there and get the information I will be dead sure to get it and dead sure to publish it, if the gentleman will let me. I am a sure shot when you give me a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, our very genial and smiling friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] would apparently put the Treasury officials at a point "between the devil and the deep sea." At one time he complains because they expend more money than is appropriated, and when, in good accord with his complaint, they properly cut off a portion of the appropriation in his district, in the largest post-office territory in the United States—the only place where they can afford to do with less janitor and elevator service—he comes in and complains of that action.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I did not complain because they cut off the janitor and elevator service in my district. In fact, I never heard of it until I read the report.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman a moment ago was complaining about it. He said the Department cut off the janitor and elevator service in the districts represented by members of the committee. Where else would they commence to cut off the service than in the gentleman's district? Would they cut off the one janitor at Buncotown or at some little place in the country and not cut them off in New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. But they cut them off at Buncotown, and that is why the members of the committee who happened to have both those towns in their district come here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They cut them off in Buncotown, which the gentleman represents here so ably on the floor of the House. They did precisely what the gentleman wanted them to do, and when they did it he complained. The only way to do is to make the appropriation and restore the service. The gentleman has no license to complain in one minute that they do a certain thing, and then when they fail to do it, to complain of that in the next minute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I have a right to complain if they violate the law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I give the gentleman the right to complain about anything. He is like myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It seems to me there has been a disobedience of the law by somebody somewhere in some Department. Is there to be a prosecution under this criminal statute that we enacted last year?

Mr. MANN. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from Tennessee that we enacted no criminal statute, and in the next place there has been no disobedience of the law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But I so understood.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the joint resolution be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if this joint resolution has not to be read under the five-minute rule? It carries an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. If the demand is made, it has to be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I make the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45,000, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services in connection with the care of public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the resolution be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I rise to ask for a minute or two in which to ask a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman for a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Chicago [Mr. MANN] tells us that we did not pass the statute which, I believe, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] reported, which we all agreed to—it was subject to a point of order—a statute to punish officials who exceeded appropriations in executing public work. Now, here is a case, and yet my good friend from Chicago for the first time, as far as I know, and certainly the first time I have ever heard of it, tells us that it is not a statute under which we can punish an offender. Is that the kind of a statute my good friend from Chicago and my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] brought in here for the purpose of punishing offenders and which we all voted for as a criminal statute?

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Tennessee is talking about the bill that we passed this year, which has nothing to do with this appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there not some law against this now?

Mr. MANN. No criminal law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman endeavored to correct in the bill that passed this year. The gentleman from Tennessee has not made the distinction between the two years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for the information. Now, I know my friend well enough to know that next year he will join the Democrats in punishing offenders——

Mr. MANN. But next year the Democrats will not be in power.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes, we will. We are going to have William J. Bryan President of the United States before a great while. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I want to say to my friend it is just as likely Mr. Bryan will be President at the next session of Congress as at the next Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I enjoy to the extreme President Roosevelt's stealing Democratic thunder and putting it in the shape of law that William J. Bryan and the Democrats have always stood for, and so we stand to-day with you rejoicing that for one time in a century we find the Republican party one time in a few things trying to do right. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the resolution be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the sundry civil bill, and move that we proceed with its consideration.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 5357. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River above the village of Monticello, Wright County, Minn.; and

S. 2418. An act to enable the Indians allotted lands in severalty within the boundaries of drainage district No. 1, in Richardson County, Nebr., to protect their lands from overflow, and for the segregation of such of said Indians from their tribal relations as may be expedient, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2969. An act to authorize the Attorney-General and certain other officers of the Department of Justice and special assistants and counsel to begin and conduct legal proceedings in any courts of the United States and before any commission or commissioner or quasi judicial body created under the laws of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 19681. An act to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4806) to regulate the landing, delivery, cure. and sale of sponges, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4862) allowing settlers with permanent improvements on the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, in Idaho, to buy lots on which said improvements are located at an appraised price for cash, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ANKENY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. DUBOIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

San Francisco, Cal., custom-house: For continuation of building under present limit, $500,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how it is so much money is given to San Francisco as contradistinguished from other cities or public buildings? I am a friend of San Francisco and of the earthquake sufferers. I want to help them and have and will continue. I have introduced a bill, Mr. Chairman, to allow a rebate on all kinds of imported structural materials used by these earthquake sufferers of California in restoring their homes and buildings. For a century or more Congress has allowed rebates on imports for persons, companies, expositions, etc. This rebate is a giving back to the earthquake sufferer the tariff tax he has paid on imported house and all material actually used.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Tennessee that the size of the appropriation must necessarily vary with the size of buildings. I do not know whether the gentleman from Tennessee ever considered that or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am very glad to know the scales are falling from my friend's eyes in that respect.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the fact, and this $900,000 is within the limit of cost of the construction of the building at San Francisco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then that is all right, and I'm for it. Now, Mr. Chairman, by way of continuing my remarks, I want to state that a few days after this earthquake at San Francisco I introduced a bill based upon a statute which Andrew Jackson, as President, approved twice, and one subsequently enacted by Congress for the relief of the Chicago sufferers; and I received, Mr. Chairman, rather to my surprise, several letters from people in San Francisco thanking me for the interest I manifested in the matter.

Among those letters, Mr. Chairman, is one from J. J. Moore & Co. and one from C. D. Bunker & Co. One of these letters states that there is now a combination being formed in the city of San Francisco for the purpose of putting up the prices "to the serious detriment of property owners and home builders."

They pray, Mr. Chairman, in substance, for the rebate relief set forth in my bill, which has no limit as to time. They say the one-year limitation set forth in the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is too short a time. They beg, Mr. Chairman, to be relieved from the denials, the punishment, and oppression not only of this local combination, but from the steel trust and the lumber trust and various other trusts that make cement and other building material, including sewer material.

But the point I wish, Mr. Chairman, just briefly to allude to is this: It has gone to the people of California, says Mr. Bunker—and I want the leader of the Democratic side [Mr. WILLIAMS] to hear publicly what I said to him privately, and which, I may add, he has positively denied—that the Democrats, writes Mr. Bunker, were objecting to the passage of a bill giving this relief, or words to that effect. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the leader of this side of the House, denied the charge, and I now repeat that so far as my humble efforts are concerned, that I shall vote for such a measure as the one I have introduced or, indeed, the ones which have been introduced by Republicans and be glad to do so, and so will the balance of the Democrats.

The President is a Republican. The Republicans control the Senate, the Republicans control the House; and I so wrote to Bunker & Co. and others, and that the Republicans, even over the protest of the Democrats, if it were possible for them to protest, could put this or that measure through Congress, not only to relieve the sufferers in California, but they can pass other bills to aid the millions of people of this country that want homes and buildings, including the Government of the United States, which is spending millions to erect post-offices and public buildings throughout this country. But the Republicans fail to do anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask a few minutes more—say five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to be allowed to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are shipping——

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman confining himself to this subject——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, of course.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). The custom-house at San Francisco?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are going to build it with structural material, and that is what I am talking about. The gentleman does not want to shut me off?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know that I do. I do not think it is possible to do so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The man never lived in this world, and will never live, who can shut my mouth in my efforts to free the American people from the robber tariff and tariff trusts. [Laughter and applause.] Now, sir, I was born in dear old Tennessee, not very far from the sacred tomb of Andrew Jackson, who approved the very kind of a bill that I have introduced in this House to aid these sufferers. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not all. In looking over the press reports I have here I find that there were about eighty churches that have been demolished in San Francisco; and, my heavens, you will not reduce the tariff to aid in rebuilding God's churches, and yet the platform of the Republican party is: "In the beginning the Republican party created the heavens and the earth." You will not take care of your own—if it costs you anything. You will not lift the robber tariff even from the mudsills that are to hold up God's church back in the land of flowers and gold, though you worship the golden calf. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, we are selling and delivering material in England for the purpose of fencing in or out "rabbits." That is a fact—the press states. You are selling it there cheaper to fence in or out "rabbits" than you do to protect the Republicans and the Democrats, their wives, their daughters, their sons, their homes, and houses. Ah, Mr. Chairman, we passed a law, similar to the Andrew Jackson statute, for the benefit of railroad building in the Philippine Islands. Yes; you cheapen railroad material to build railroads for the yellow-bellied Filipinos; yet, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to the restoration of the homes of the exalted and the poor and of God's churches, in grief-stricken California the Republican party "stands pat."

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the delegation, so far as I know, from that great and glorious old State, that is peopled largely by sons from Tennessee, that State that was annexed to this country by a Tennessee President, sent able Representatives here to "stand pat." I have heard no speeches from them in this House so far, when their homes and firesides, in a Republican State, with a Republican constituency, are seized in the jaws of a local monopoly in connection with the ungodly steel trust, which is punishing the American people everywhere by monopolistic and oppressive prices.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, I had sincerely hoped, that I would not have cause to be called to speak thus to-day, but I do so because the people of Tennessee love Californians and justice is being denied her people. Californians took care of the immortal First Tennessee Regiment when they went to the Philippine Islands, and when they returned, and that good old woman, Mrs. Townsend, now dead and gone, spent fifteen or twenty thousand dollars of her money to take care of them when they were hungry, weary, and worn, away from home. We love the Californians, and if the great lawmakers from that State in this House and in the nation do not want to crush the steel trust, the lumber trust, the cement trust, and every other sort of an outlaw that wants to oppress these people, there will always be found one from Tennessee who will not put party above home, put party above constituency, put party, Mr. Chairman, on top of a bleeding, oppressed, and defenseless people who are crying for bread and you give them a stone. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Sherman, Tex., post-office and court-house: For continuation of building under present limit, $40,000.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. On yesterday the gentleman from Arkansas stated that he desired thirty minutes of time on a certain provision of this bill. At that time I informed him that when we were in Committee of the Whole if he desired that time I would consent that he should have it. I am informed that it is necessary for him to leave, and I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for thirty minutes at this time if he desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks that the gentleman from Arkansas may be permitted to proceed for thirty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, during the time allotted to me in which to discuss this bill I wish to confine myself to the discussion of one single item in it. That item will be found on page 94, where provision is made for the appropriation of $25,000 to defray the traveling expenses of the President for the next fiscal year, together with his invited guests.

My objections to this item are several. In the first place, I object to it because it is an indirect attempt to raise the salary of the President of the United States. If the present salary of the Chief Executive of this Government is inadequate, if it is insufficient, then I undoubtedly would favor a proper increase in that salary, but it ought to be done openly and frankly by an act of Congress, passed through this House, that would apply not only to the present President of the United States, but to all future Executives as well. This appropriation, if made, comes in contravention of existing law. It applies to the present Executive alone. It may not apply to the next. It may never apply to any other. It is the manner in which this salary is sought to be raised that first challenges my objection. I do not believe that Congress ought to be asked to do that indirectly which it has not the manhood and courage to do directly, openly, and aboveboard, and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I am opposed to this item in the bill, and hope the same will be stricken out.

Then, again, I say to the House frankly that I am aware of no duty devolving upon the Chief Executive, I am aware of not a single official act that the President of the United States has to perform the performance of which calls him beyond the seat of government or requires any travel whatever on his part. I do not believe that this appropriation ought to be made for the purpose of saying to the President of the United States that it is the opinion and judgment of Congress that you ought to absent yourself from the seat of government as much as possible and encourage trip after trip to be taken, when his services possibly are needed here in Washington at the seat of government to look after governmental affairs and to properly discharge the duties of his office, and for this additional reason I am opposed to it.

Again, it is a new departure. No Congress has ever yet appropriated money from the public Treasury to pay the traveling expenses of the Chief Executive, nor have they ever thought of doing such a thing, and, in my candid judgment, the suggestion for this new departure comes from the Chief Executive or the White House, either directly or indirectly. Mr. Chairman, for that reason I am strongly opposed to the appropriation. I believe if necessity for legislation exists, which the President of the United States sees and recognizes, he should send his message to the entire Congress, pointing out the necessity of the legislation and the wisdom of the same, and not by making suggestions to a few Members of this House or a few members of the Senate, by sending for a few favored pets from the House or Senate and carrying them through the back room of the White House into some secret chamber, there to formulate and shape national legislation, such as the President may desire enacted or defeat such as he may be opposed to.

Mr. Chairman, the country has recently witnessed at least one striking instance of the evil effects of this character of legislation attempted upon the part of the President of the United States. I refer to the pending railroad rate bill, the history of which is entirely familiar to the country. I hope that the time will speedily come when no President of the United States will dare to speak to a Member of Congress or a United States Senator in secret or private about what kind of legislation he thinks this body should enact. Let his messages come in an open and frank manner; let them come to the whole American Congress, and through them to the American people, for by no other way and no other means can this Government be maintained upon the principles and policies upon which it was originally established by our forefathers, and upon which every patriotic citizen desires it should remain forever. Then, again, we can not separate ourselves from the fact, we can not blind ourselves to the truth, that the majority of the trips taken by Presidents over the country have not been wholly devoid of political significance. I see no good nor valid reason why Congress should appropriate money to defray the campaign expenses of the President of the United States, and if we are going to do so then why not pay the expenses of every other man who may be running for office? This is a new departure also, the hurtful effects of which will sooner or later dawn upon every man in this House, regardless of his political convictions. It may be well to look and see what this bill really carries for the support of the President and the Executive Mansion of this Government. It is true his salary is only $50,000, but of the sum total this is an insignificant amount. The legislative bill passed by this House carries the following appropriations:

For the President's salary, $50,000; for a secretary to the President and other employees in the Executive Office, $66,340; for contingent expenses to the President, $20,000.

The amounts carried in this bill in addition to those I have just mentioned are as follows:

Ordinary care of the Executive Mansion, $35,000; extraordinary repairs of the Executive Mansion, $35,000.

It is a little singular, Mr. Chairman—in fact, to the ordinary citizen it would be considered almost strange—that the amount required for the ordinary repairs and the amount required for the extraordinary repairs were alike this year—$35,000—exactly the same to the fraction of a cent. And yet that is the amount appropriated.

For fuel to the Executive Mansion, $6,000; care of the conservatory and greenhouse, $9,000; repairs to the greenhouse, $3,000; improvements and maintenance of the Executive Mansion, $4,000; traveling expenses of the President, $25,000.

Making the sum total of $253,340 that will be appropriated by this Congress to maintain the President and the Executive Mansion of this Government if this bill is enacted into law.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the sum of $253,340 is asked to be appropriated by this Congress to support the President and maintain the Executive Mansion, a comparison of these items with the expenses for the same purpose in former years may not be wholly uninteresting to the Members of this House. Let us take, for instance, 1901, the last year of President McKinley's Administration. Compare these items with the appropriations for that year. The salary, of course, was the same—$50,000—but for a private secretary and other employees of the Executive Mansion he was allowed $48,500, as against $66,340 in the present bill. For contingent expenses President McKinley, in 1901, was given by Congress $12,000, as against $20,000 carried by the present bill. For care of the White House and refurnishing of the same, Congress appropriated $20,000, against $35,000 in the present bill. For extraordinary repairs, nothing was given; for fuel to the Executive Mansion, $3,000 was appropriated, or one-half the sum that is carried in the present bill. That may be accounted for, Mr. Chairman, and doubtless can be, by the assurance, which we all feel, that under the present management of the White House they are running under a double head of steam just now, and require twice as much fuel as they have ever required before. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

For care of the conservatory and greenhouses, $2,000 was allotted to President McKinley, as against $9,000 carried by the present bill. Thus it will be seen that, all told, the expenses of the President and the White House for 1901, the last year of President McKinley's Administration, amounted to $147,000, or $106,000 less than the items carried in this bill as the expenses of the present occupant of the White House.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us make one other comparison. Turn, if you please, to 1897, the last year of Grover Cleveland's occupancy of the White House as President of this country, and compare the expenses of that year, and we find: For the President's salary, $50,000; for secretary to the President and employees of the Executive Mansion, $35,200; for contingent expenses, $8,000; for ordinary care and refurnishing of the Executive Mansion, $20,000; fuel for the Executive Mansion, $3,000; care of conservatory and greenhouses, $2,000; traveling expenses of the President, nothing; repairs to greenhouses, $4,000; improvements of Executive Mansion and grounds, $13,000, making the sum total of $135,200, a difference of $118,140 in favor of the Administration of Grover Cleveland. The expenses of the President and the White House were that much less than this House is to-day asked to appropriate to maintain the present occupant. This is not to be wondered at, nor is it in the least surprising, for I recall no instance where a comparison has ever been made between the public money expended by a Democratic Administration and that of a Republican one, but what the advantage always has been, and always will be, found to be in favor of the Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I shall here attach a statement giving the expenditures in detail for the different years:

	1897.[a]	1901.[b]	1906.[c]
President's salary	$50,000	$50,000	$50,000
Secretary and other employees in Executive Office	35,200	48,500	66,340
Contingent expenses	8,000	12,000	20,000
Ordinary care and refurnishing Executive Mansion	20,000	20,000	35,000
Extraordinary repairs of Executive Mansion	.....	.....	35,000
Fuel for Executive Mansion	3,000	3,000	6,000
Care of conservatory and greenhouses	2,000	2,000	9,000
Repairs to greenhouses	4,000	5,000	3,000
Improvements and maintenance of Executive Grounds and Mansion	13,000	12,000	4,000
Traveling expenses of President and invited guests	.....	.....	25,000
Total	135,200	152,500	253,340

[a] Cleveland. [b] McKinley. [c] Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman, this is not all. There is a belief, well founded and consistent, that the Army appropriation bill that recently passed this House carries with it an addition to the $263,340 here appropriated, which is to be used by the Chief Executive of this Government. What it is, how much it is, where it is, how it is appropriated, no man can obtain the direct and positive information; and yet the belief is so general and well founded that I find no man who will challenge the fact that it exists and is made year after year. I am forced to the conclusion that it would prove highly interesting to the country to know just what this is and what it is used for.

But this is not all. In addition to this, we appropriate for forty policemen, whose sole and only duty it is to guard the White House, the White House grounds, and the Chief Executive. This will add an expense of $40,000 per annum, bringing the grand total of expenditures that we are called upon to make to maintain the present Chief Executive and the White House up to more than $300,000 for this year, and how much more no mortal man can tell, though it must be considerable.

I am not prepared to say that forty policemen to guard the President and the White House are too many or too few. I confess I do not know. It seems to me, however, that it would be the part of wisdom and economy to station a section of the Army about that magnificent building to guard the present occupant and let at least some of these policemen devote their attention to protecting the innocent women and children of the city of Washington, who are being assaulted night after night.

But, Mr. Chairman, in this I may be entirely wrong, for I recall the fact that recently at the White House they made one very important, brave, and gallant arrest. By the aid of a negro these gentlemen succeeded in ejecting from the White House an inoffensive, quiet, peaceable American lady. They carried her out with force, like a criminal. They carried her out in a manner that has ever been and ever will remain an outrageous insult to the American people, American manhood, and American womanhood alike. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In my candid judgment, it was disgraceful in the extreme, and may the scene never be witnessed again—an innocent, nonoffending woman, whose only offense had been a desire to see the great chief of the United States, in the Executive Mansion of this Government, on purely a matter of business, thus treated. And, Mr. Chairman, when these gallant heroes and brave warriors had succeeded, with much danger, no doubt, to their personal safety and security, in expelling this defenseless character from this magnificent mansion, it seems to me that ordinary decency and ordinary propriety would have suggested that there the matter stop, at least in so far as they were concerned. Such was not the case, however, for we find this same set, this same lot of policemen, passing throughout the city of Washington, going into the different department stores, questioning employees. We find them writing letters into other cities and other States in order to discover and unearth some evidence of the fact that there was some stain or some blot on the character of this woman whom they had so unceremoniously and cowardly ejected from the White House of the Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this, in my judgment, was the greater crime of the two. It is repulsive to decency, to honor and integrity alike. But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all. If these forty gentlemen ought to be retained there and are necessary, I have no objection; but we learn that this gallant gentleman, the brave and fearless employee who gave the order that this lady should be thus arrested and ejected from the White House, finds his reward by being appointed by the Chief Executive of this Government to one of the highest offices in the gift of the President. He is made postmaster of the great city of Washington; and thus again we are confronted with the great truth that bravery has its own reward. [Laughter.] I do not know Barnes, and I do not want to know him; but, in my candid judgment, his appointment as postmaster of the great city of Washington is an insult but little less, if any, than the ejection of Mrs. Morris from the White House in the first instance, and the womanhood and manhood of Washington ought to rise up and with one acclaim protest against the outrage.

But we are told further, in addition to the $25,000 to defray the expenses of the President and his invited guests—and I suppose they will all be Republican spellbinders out to save the country in the coming campaign—in addition to that this committee was asked to incorporate an item of $50,000 to build a new stable for the present occupant of the White House in which to stable his high-stepping and magnificent steeds. It developed and was shown that he has, all told, five carriage horses and five saddle horses. His Secretary has four carriage horses, the Executive Mansion one carriage horse, making in all fifteen in number, to say nothing of those that the other employees have. Of this number we are told that while they keep the carriage horses in the present White House stables, it has been discovered that on account of its low location, on account of the dampness that arises early in the morning and settles late in the evening over that particular locality, that the present incumbent of the White House has discovered that it is entirely too unhealthy for him to keep his saddle horses in it, and he stables them elsewhere. Just where he stables them, just what the Government pays for the stabling, nobody knows. Nobody has ever been able to ascertain, but let us hope, Mr. Chairman, that they are at least housed on some magnificent height in the city of Washington where the cool and refreshing air brings joy and health to those magnificent steppers, and that the surrounding scenery is the most sublime and magnificent, for they are the strenuous steeds of a most strenuous Executive. [Laughter.]

Just how much longer this tomfoolery is to be indulged in the average citizen of this country would like to know. The vicinity of the location of the present White House stables is found to be healthy enough for a large number of innocent women and children and honest men of this country to live in, and there they have lived day after day, month after month, and year after year without murmur or complaint; but the location is entirely too unhealthy for five of the President's saddle horses that he desires to stable in a more healthy locality, and asks Congress to appropriate $50,000 to build him a new stable. And we will do it—that is, our friends on the other side will do it. They may defer it this year, but, in my candid judgment, as certain as fate, next year you will find it in the appropriation bill, because this gentleman has got a way of having his own way, and our friends over there on the other side invariably yield.

Now, I suppose it is true, Mr. Chairman, that if this appropriation of $25,000 is made, some part of it may be used by the present incumbent of the White House in traveling to different parts of the United States and redelivering the celebrated lecture, two or three times already delivered, upon the subject of the muck rake. As for myself, and I believe also I may speak for a large portion of the people of this Government, we have heard already quite enough of this muck-rake nonsense and are disgusted with it. No wonder, in view of present appropriations and present expenditures—no wonder that the President should hold up to public ridicule magazines and newspapers of this country and public men and private citizens who dare to criticise. Mr. Chairman, I entertain the hope and the belief that the time will never come in the history of the politics of this Government when any man occupying a position of public trust and public office will rise so high and become so great that all, from the humblest citizen and most obscure newspaper to the largest and greatest, may not justly and properly criticise his official conduct and actions when criticism is needed, for herein lies our greatest safety. In my judgment, to make this appropriation is not only a departure, but it is unwise, un-American, and undemocratic. How any man occupying a seat upon this side of the Chamber, calling himself a Democrat, can vote for the enactment of this provision into law and for this expenditure of public money I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to understand. I sought to place upon the files of this House my dissenting views from this appropriation. Although they were prepared and filed within less than two hours after the filing of the report by the chairman of this committee I was informed that I was too late, that I would have to obtain unanimous consent from the House or else my views could not be published.

I recall no other case, I recall no other instance, where any man who desired to file either a minority report or dissenting views—and filed them on the same day the majority report was made—where he was denied the right which justly belonged to him to have the same printed and printed along with the majority report. But it seems that some power unknown to me, some gentleman of high authority likewise unknown to me, has made the objection and that the public printing of the same was refused until I should obtain from this House unanimous consent. Mr. Chairman, at that time I respectfully declined and do yet to ask the House to give me the privilege to do what every other gentleman has always had the right to do without request, and what I believe I had the right to do, unanimous consent or no unanimous consent. It but emphasizes the fact that power in the hands of a small person, whoever he may be, is a dangerous thing indeed. How long this kind of thing is to continue, how far it is to reach I am unable to say. I am unable to predict. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I read in the signs of the times and in the public press one hopeful indication. The people of the country are getting tired of the feeling of expectancy and excitement. They never know what is going to happen from one day to the other, and at last the so-called "business interests" of this country, and the conservative, liberty-loving manhood of this Government, are turning to William J. Bryan as the conservative, safe candidate for President of the United states in 1908. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe that it means a Democratic victory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

San Francisco, Cal., custom-house: For continuation of building under present limit, $500,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the clause just read, the appropriation for the San Francisco custom-house, as known to everybody, is being put in at this time partly, at any rate, for the purpose of helping those who have suffered by the earthquake and fire there. I want to make a few remarks concerning what has been partially discussed, as I am informed, in the House this morning by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. I had been appointed as one of the committee to attend the funeral of Senator GORMAN, and was not at the time in the Chamber. I see from a newspaper clipping, which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has shown to me, that there has been an effort made in San Francisco to throw the blame of what lack of energy there has been in the House in relation to the drawback bill for the relief of San Francisco upon the minority and its so-called "obstructive tactics." I notice from this extract that somebody reports from here that the reason why the Republican party does not pass the bill which was intended to give a rebate of duties upon building material brought for the purpose of rebuilding San Francisco, as was done in the case of Portland and Chicago, was because there would be obstruction upon the Democratic side. I want now to say what the House already knows and what probably the country has not noticed, that even when I was denying unanimous consent for any sort of legislation, I always made an exception of the appeals for the relief of San Francisco upon the ground that that was a totally exceptional thing of an emergency character, something that must be done at once. It is untrue, Mr. Chairman, that either I, or this side, have ever been disposed to delay in the slightest degree any legislation for the benefit of these people. We were ready and we are ready now to vote at any time that the Republican Committee on Ways and Means will bring the bill to the House, and I am ready upon the committee to vote for a bill giving a rebate of duties on importations of materials brought into this country for rebuilding San Francisco.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is no new legislation. It was done in the case of Boston and it was done in the case of Chicago; but when Baltimore, a southern city, burned down, I introduced a bill asking that the same measure of relief be accorded to Baltimore. That was voted down in the committee and was never permitted to be reported to this House—for what good reason I was ever, and am now, unable to ascertain. Why Boston and Chicago should be put upon one footing and Baltimore upon another I have not yet learned——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But notwithstanding that fact, I am ready now to forget what has been denied Baltimore, to "return good for evil," and do for San Francisco what gentlemen would not do for Baltimore. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman certainly does not mean to state to the House that relief was given to Boston?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I have always understood that to be true.

Mr. KAHN. That was not true; it was denied to Boston.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was given to Chicago.

Mr. KAHN. And also to Portland, Me., in 1866.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Portland, Me., in 1866. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my recollection is correct or whether that of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is correct. I have never looked up the act to find whether there was such an act, but I have always understood that like legislation was had for Boston; but whether it was or whether it was not, it was had for Chicago, it was had for Portland, and it was denied to Baltimore, although a bill was introduced and its passage was asked. Now, I do not know whether a bill was introduced for Boston or not. Now, Mr. Chairman, brick, cement, marble, glass—some of the ordinary window-glass bears by the way over 100 per cent tariff tax—lumber, nails, structural steel—all these that are now heavily tariff taxed, some, as I have said, over 100 per cent, are needed for the reconstruction of San Francisco, and I want the country to understand that the only obstruction in this House is the coterie of obstruction to everything else that touches the "System," as Tom Lawson would call it, the obstruction of stand-patism and the obstruction of stand-patters. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If gentlemen from California who represent the Republican party upon this floor are in earnest, let them prod up the members of the Republican party upon the Committee on Ways and Means. They will not have to prod up the Democrats; we are ready for you now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, it is a curious thing. This House votes by unanimous consent millions of dollars out of the Treasury to aid the people of San Francisco with, perhaps, a doubtful right to do it, but everybody declined even to debate it. It was done; but when it comes to giving a small amount of money in the way of tariff-tax rebates gentlemen stand here and decline to do it. There must be a reason. It is not because of the amount of money. No; it is because they have a superstitious fear of touching the "System." You will give the money that has been paid into the Treasury, that belongs to the people, and you, perhaps, do right to give it, but when you come to take a dollar out of the pockets of the cohort of manufacturers who are protected by your system by permitting competition with them to give it to the sufferers you dare not do it. They are the men who mold your legislation. They are the men who get up your campaign fund. You will give millions of dollars of the people's money out of the Treasury, but when it comes to giving only hundreds of thousands of dollars in such a way that it might possibly be a diminution of the profits that go into the pockets of the manufacturers you do not make any serious effort to do it. You delay it; you refuse it. Why, some Republicans have become constitutional lawyers upon the question, as I understand. I understand it has been said that a drawback law of that sort would be unconstitutional; that it would violate the uniform-taxation clause of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Chairman, there is no difference between giving money already collected and in the Treasury and giving money that might be collected that is not yet in the Treasury by passing a drawback law to return it after collection. And upon two occasions prior to this at least, and, as I still think, though possibly I may be mistaken, three occasions, you have made a precedent and no constitutional violation has been found by any court to exist. I did not know until a moment ago that anybody in the wide world dared to attempt to lay the blame of this delay or this nonfeasance, if there be blame attached, to the Democratic party or to me, but hereafter it will be certain that nobody will attempt it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has anybody who is in anywise connected with the Committee on Ways and Means made any intimation of that character, so far as you know?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. That is the reason I had not heard of it until this morning, when this San Francisco paper was handed me with this matter, which appears to have been written here in Washington.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the members of that committee would very cheerfully join in giving a certificate of good moral character to all the Democratic members upon that particular question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. Chairman! "Praise from Sir Hubert is praise, indeed!" I am glad the gentleman continues right and is not going to permit his partisanship to make him attempt to get party advantage out of a statement that would not be true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion here?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. TAWNEY. This matter is entirely foreign to the subject of the bill. Now, I do not want to object to the gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from Mississippi. The gentleman has already consumed ten minutes. I will ask him if he can conclude his remarks in five minutes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care to occupy any further time, except to answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I shall not object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to state that I have letters here from California stating, or going to show——

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the same statement you made some time ago——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). That that statement has gone out——

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the same statement that you made a while ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). By which they believed the Democrats here are blocking the passage of the California relief proposition. I have telegrams and letters here asking us to obliterate party lines and pass this measure, and the Democrats stand here ready to-day to do it; and we have not been blocking this proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Am I recognized? Was there any objection?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Mississippi will be recognized for five minutes. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, one other thing that it may be well for me to add in this connection. Whether the country at large knows it or not, the Members of the House know and I want the country to know that there was one object, and one only, in what many people incorrectly called a filibuster that was operated on this side of the Chamber. In the first place, it was not a filibuster, because except upon the Lee bill, which stood on a different footing, there was no real filibuster. We merely resorted to our constitutional privilege under the rules to call for the yeas and nays, to refuse unanimous consent, and to have a quorum present. In doing that this House understood that our object was to coerce a report from the conference committee upon the statehood question. That report was finally—well, brought in. The report was made, and as soon as the report was made our object in pursuing that policy had been accomplished, and therefore we ceased to pursue the policy any further, and will not resume the policy unless it shall appear later on that the Speaker and the controlling element of this House is not going to permit the Members of the House of Representatives to have a vote upon the separate provisions of the conference report.

If it shall appear to the bitter end that this House is not to be permitted to express itself upon the several provisions of the statehood conference report; if it shall appear we are to be gagged by another rule, or if it shall appear that we are to be forced to swallow the conference report in gross, either to vote against it altogether or vote for it altogether, without an opportunity to amend it, without an opportunity being extended to the House to express its opinion upon the question whether or not Oklahoma and the Indian Territory should be admitted as one State, and Arizona and New Mexico left for the future to deal with, or else admitted separately; if that shall later appear, then we will resume the policy of demanding that every constitutional requirement shall be complied with before any legislation is carried on by this body until the Speaker's obstruction of the right of the House to handle itself shall cease. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[From New York Sun of May 2, 1906.]

FEDERAL RELIEF OF CHICAGO AFTER THE FIRE.

The Chicago fire, in which 250 people lost their lives and 98,500 their homes, and property valued at $196,000,000 was destroyed, occurred on October 7, 8, and 9, 1871. On December 11, soon after Congress met, Representative H. C. Burchard, of Illinois, introduced a bill for the relief of sufferers by the fire, the wording of the bill passed by Congress for the relief of the people of Portland after the fire on July 4, 1866, being closely followed. In the Portland fire property valued at $10,000,000 was destroyed and one-fourth of the population lost their homes and were in want.

The Burchard bill was amended in the Senate, and as it passed that body it provided that "all goods, wares, and merchandise" sent "from places without the limits of the United States as gratuitous contributions" for the relief of Chicago should be admitted free of duty; that there should be a drawback of the import duties "on all materials imported to be and actually used in buildings erected on the site of buildings burned by said fire," provided that the materials should have been imported and used during the term of one year from and after the passage of the act; and that the collection of internal revenue taxes of sufferers by the fire who had resided, done business, or owned property in the burned district should be suspended "until after the close of the next regular session of Congress."

When the bill was returned to the House a stand was made by the lumber interests, and it was amended so as to provide that drawbacks should not be paid upon lumber imported for Chicago. The Senate accepted the amendment. A plausible argument for the exception of lumber from the operation of the law was made by Representative Omar D. Conger.

Mr. Thurman, of Ohio, declared that this argument was almost as old as the Constitution. "We have again and again," he said, "remitted duties on articles imported into the United States for specific purposes. I think we did remit duties upon all articles imported here for exhibition purposes at the national exposition." Mr. Sherman thought the bill might be a bad precedent, but he added: "It seems to me it does not come within the literal language of the Constitution. I regard it as simply a gratuity, a contribution by the people of the United States for the relief of the sufferers by fire at Chicago." Mr. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, saw no constitutional difficulty. "As I understand it," he said, "the Constitution requires that there shall be no unequal system of duties, that the system shall be uniform throughout the United States; not that Congress may not in a specific case, as a matter of charity, relieve the collection of duties. Surely Congress has just as good a right to omit to receive $1,000,000 or $500,000 of duties coming into the Treasury as to pay out that amount. It is a matter of charity, not affecting the Constitution, which requires that the general system shall be uniform throughout the nation."

Mr. KAHN. I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, the history of drawback legislation, so far as it relates to building material for the rehabilitation of communities destroyed by fire, is exceedingly interesting. In 1866 the city of Portland, Me., was visited by a conflagration which consumed a great part of that city. The fire occurred on the 4th and 5th days of July of that year. When Congress convened in the following December a bill was promptly passed which allowed the citizens of that community to receive a drawback upon such building material as they should import for the reconstruction and the rehabilitation of their city. This drawback was to be allowed, I believe, for a period of one year from the 6th day of July, 1866. And I think the records show that only $22,000 was paid back to the people of that community in drawbacks. So that, after all, they did not derive any great advantage from the legislation. When the terrible catastrophe occurred in Chicago, in October, 1871, a bill of similar import was introduced in the Congress on the 5th of December, 1871. That bill finally passed and became a law on the 5th of April, 1872. By its terms the people of Chicago were to receive the benefits of the drawback for one year, except upon lumber. Lumber was especially excluded from the provisions of that bill, the reason being that at that time the great lumber tracts in Michigan had also been devastated by fire, and the lumbermen of that region were also in distress.

It was deemed unwise, in the face of their misfortune, to subject them to the harmful competition of Canadian lumbermen, and lumber was especially excepted from the Chicago relief bill. The entire amount of money that was repaid in the nature of drawbacks in the Chicago case amounted to $185,000. That was all the money that was given back in the nature of drawbacks during the entire year within which the law was in operation. And to secure that meager advantage, the Chicago bill was debated in this House and in the Senate off and on during the entire period from December 5, 1871, to March 29, 1872. Mr. Chairman, the debate upon the Chicago relief bill had scarcely passed into history when another fire devastated a great city of our Union. I refer to the city of Boston, Mass. The conflagration there occurred on the 9th and 10th of November, 1872. Again a bill was introduced in the Congress of the United States, having for its object the giving to the people of Boston the privileges of a drawback on building material to be used in the rebuilding of that historic old municipality. That bill passed the House of Representatives, but when it came up in the Senate serious objection was made. It was contended by lawyers of eminent distinction that the provisions of such a measure were decidedly unconstitutional. The question of constitutionality had not been raised in the cases of Portland and Chicago, or at any rate this was the first time that it was seriously considered. The bill was debated in that body for a number of hours, and finally, upon motion of Senator Thurman, of Ohio, the entire question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate.

In making the motion to refer, the distinguished Senator from Ohio—and he was a great constitutional lawyer—said:

Mr. President, this bill is one on which there is some danger of the heart running away with the head, and that may be said of all such bills. There is certainly a grave constitutional question involved in this bill. * * * I am quite sure that every Senator is disposed to exercise any constitutional power we possess to afford relief to the people of Boston. But there is a fundamental rule in regard to the Constitution, and that is, that where a power is doubtful the legislature ought to abstain from attempting the exercise of it. * * * Now, for one, I wish more light than I have upon this subject. Other Senators may have considered this question so fully that their minds are made up on the constitutional point. I confess that mine is not; and I should be very glad, therefore, before another precedent of this kind is set, that this subject should receive careful judicial consideration. Fires occur, calamities occur every year in the country, and as the settlements extend they will be more numerous. It will be very difficult to draw any line of distinction between a calamity by fire or by a tornado or by an earthquake or by a great flood. I do not see how any distinction can be drawn; and if Congress is to intervene with relief in every case in which any community, however large or however small, in the great extent of territory belonging to the United States shall be a sufferer, I do not know where will be the end of our benevolence, the example being once fully set. * * * Now, it does seem to me that before any more precedents are built up on this subject this matter should receive a careful legal consideration, and I hope, therefore, that the Senators who favor this bill will consent to the motion I am about to submit, and that is that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for report.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] will question the ability or the Democracy of Senator Thurman. He himself was a member of that great committee to which the bill was thereupon referred. The full personnel of the committee was as follows: Senators George F. Edmunds, of Vermont; Roscoe Conkling, of New York; Matthew H. Carpenter, of Wisconsin; Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey; John Pool, of North Carolina; George G. Wright, of Iowa, and Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio. It was a committee of remarkably able men. True, two opinions upon this measure were subsequently filed in the Senate from that committee—a majority and a minority report. The majority report held that the bill in question was unquestionably unconstitutional; and as Senator Thurman did not sign the minority report, it is reasonable to suppose that his views were entirely in accord with the majority, which majority, as I have just stated, contended that such legislation was absolutely unconstitutional.

The two Senators from California at that time, one of them being a Democrat and the other a Republican, both voted to refer the matter to the Judiciary Committee. Let us see what Senator Casserly, the Democratic Senator from that State, had to say upon that occasion. I quote from his speech in the Senate, delivered on December 13, 1872. He said:

Being on my feet, I shall say a word or two as to the vote which I shall give on the pending motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] to commit this bill to the Judiciary Committee.

I shall vote for the motion. I think it very desirable that in the obvious conflict of views which exists in this body among some of the ablest and most experienced Senators we should have the aid of the Judiciary Committee on arriving at a proper conclusion upon this bill. For myself, I ought to say in candor that I see no way of avoiding the constitutional objection which has been urged here, first, I believe, by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Carpenter], and afterwards sustained by other Senators on each side of the Chamber.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] argued with great earnestness and much force of illustration that the bill is not a bill in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution; first, that all duties shall be uniform; and, next, that Congress shall give no preference by any regulation of revenue or commerce to the ports of one State over the ports of any other. I can not agree with him. * * *

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] seeks to avoid the constitutional objection by striking out of his bill the name of the port of Boston. I apprehend this will hardly reach the difficulty. True, it does, in terms, make the bill a general bill entitling all articles to a drawback wherever imported if they are to be used, and are in fact used, in the construction of buildings upon the site of buildings burned in the fire of Boston. The effect remains the same, however. You still, in effect, give a preference to the port of Boston. The articles are to be used there to be entitled to a drawback. Of course no one will think of importing them at any other port. Boston will still have the preference forbidden by the Constitution. This will be extremely plain if you consider the bill as though it provided that the articles were to be sold in Boston—which is really the effect of it—and on that ground were entitled to a drawback. Could the constitutionality of such a bill be maintained? Why not? Because the import business would all go to that port in preference to ports in any other State. That would be the practical effect of such an act.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Casserly was one of the great lawyers of the State of California. He was also an ardent Democrat. He held the bill in question to be unconstitutional, and, as I have already remarked, he voted to send it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

But there was no effort made at that time to consider the question in a narrow, partisan light, as is being attempted here. Let us recapitulate the vote upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio (Mr. Thurman) to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The vote stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Bayard, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Casserly, Chandler, Clayton, Cole, Conkling, Cooper, Corbett, Davis, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Harlan, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Kelly, Machen, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Osborn, Pratt, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Tipton, West, and Windom—35.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Hamlin, Logan, Patterson, Pomeroy, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, and Wilson—15.

But the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber will say, "Why, Senator Thurman is not recorded on this vote at all!" That is true. But the Senate was fully informed as to how he would have voted had he been present, for just prior to the roll call this announcement was made:

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Now, I desire to call the fact to the attention of the Members of this House that nearly all of the Democratic Senators who voted upon that motion voted in favor of committing the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

But, Mr. Chairman, in committing that matter to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate at that time, Senator Thurman stated that it was not done with the object of burying the bill. On the contrary, it was presumed that it was giving the bill into the hands of its friends, because five of the seven members of that committee had been in the Senate when the Chicago bill was under consideration, and five of those seven members had voted in favor of the Chicago bill on the first vote, although after the reconsideration there were three members of the committee who voted against it, so that it was reasonable to suppose that the Judiciary Committee at least was not unfriendly to the project.

The bill was committed on December 13, 1872, and on January 20, 1873, the Committee on the Judiciary, by Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, a man concerning whose great ability as a constitutional lawyer I presume there will be no difference of opinion upon this floor, filed in the Senate a report, known as "Report No. 311, Forty-second Congress, third session." In that report Mr. Carpenter and four of his colleagues hold that the bill is altogether unconstitutional on two grounds: First, that it contravenes section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which reads:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The committee held that in giving one community an advantage over another community in the shape of a drawback, it would be giving the community so favored an advantage never contemplated and expressly prohibited by the Constitution, in that it would prevent the law from being enforced uniformly throughout the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has there been any proposition to exempt from the payment of import duties goods imported into San Francisco? As I understand it, the proposition has been to collect the duties and then to pay the money back out of the Treasury.

Mr. KAHN. The bill in the Boston case is identical with this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but in either case was there ever a proposition to relieve from the duty on imports the people of either Boston, Portland, Chicago, or San Francisco? If there had been, of course it would have been unconstitutional. Has not every bill contained a proposition, and does not the bill now for San Francisco contain a proposition, not to interfere with the levying or collection of the duties, but merely to pay back to the people there a sum of money fixed beforehand, to be equal to what they have paid?

Mr. KAHN. As I understand it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if that be true, what is the difference between that fact and the appropriating of $240,000, if it will amount to that?

Mr. KAHN. As I understand it, that very point was raised at the time the Boston bill was before the Senate; Senator Casserly, of California, argued it very fully, and it was held at that time——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield just now. It was held at that time that you can not do indirectly that which you can not do directly; which, of course, is a principle of law that the gentleman will not dispute.

Now, in addition to that section of the Constitution, the committee also held that the bill was unconstitutional in this, that it contravened section 9 of the same article, which reads:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

The Senate at that time held that that was good law, and the precedent established in the case of Boston has never since been changed—it has been constantly maintained ever since.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senate pass upon the matter, or was it simply that committee?

Mr. KAHN. That committee brought in this report on January 20, 1873, and the Senate never thereafter considered the bill. After this report was filed the bill was allowed to rest on the files of the Senate. It never went any further.

Once more, in the case of Baltimore, a similar measure was introduced in this House, as I understand it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman leaves the Boston matter, did not the Boston bill release from duty all imports brought in at Charlestown, Mass., and Boston, Mass.? That is not the bill that is pending, and no such bill has ever been introduced anywhere for the benefit of San Francisco.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know whether the Boston relief bill contained that provision or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It did.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Was that report from the Senate committee unanimous?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Boston bill refers specifically to Charlestown Harbor and Boston Harbor. Now, we do not mention any harbor at all in this bill.

Mr. KAHN. As far as that goes, the committee passing upon the question at that time considered the very proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, and held that it was unconstitutional. I commend him to the report of the debates in the Senate at that time, and also to a reading of the committee report. They will prove instructive to him.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was there not a dissenting report in that case?

Mr. KAHN. There was.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By whom? Judge Edmunds and Senator Wright, two of the greatest lawyers we have ever had.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but five of the committee held that it was unconstitutional. And they were Senators Carpenter, Thurman, Conkling, Frelinghuysen, and Pool. The gentleman from Tennessee will not deny that they also were among the greatest lawyers we have ever had. In the case of Baltimore no action was taken, it having been held that the Congress had established a precedent in the case of Boston. That precedent had not been deviated from for twenty years, and it was deemed not advisable to raise this constitutional question again. Therefore it was decided that nothing should be done, and nothing was done, and Baltimore never received any relief. And although many other cities have been stricken in various ways since the Boston case, the precedent established at that time has never since been departed from.

Immediately after the catastrophe that befell San Francisco on the 18th of last April I went to that city, and on my return here I found that a number of bills had been introduced granting drawbacks on building material to be used in San Francisco; and a number of its citizens wrote to me in regard to the matter. I made inquiries among my colleagues, and I soon learned that it was impossible to pass such a bill. I have learned, furthermore, through letters recently received by me, that one year's relief in San Francisco would be practically of no benefit to the people there. The catastrophe was so great, was so appalling, that a relief bill of this kind would practically afford no relief at all, because modern buildings are built largely of structural steel, and it takes almost a year to put up a single building of that character; and unless a bill could be passed exempting building materials from duty for three years, it would probably be of no use at all to the people of San Francisco. But aside from that, the members of the California delegation, individual members of that delegation, have been assured that the steel manufacturing companies of this country would give preference to orders from San Francisco over all others; that there would be no attempt made to raise the price of structural steel to be used by the people of San Francisco in the rehabilitation of their city. Again, take the case of cement. I have had a letter within the last three days on the subject, and I say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the only cement that has been increased in price at San Francisco is the foreign, imported cement. The cement which is manufactured in California is purchased there to-day at the same price it was sold for before the fire.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Secretary Taft states that all cement from foreign countries is cheaper than the American cement, and he is trying to get the Government to make cement for the Panama Canal on the Isthmus in order to avoid the cement trust of this country, which the gentleman wants to turn San Francisco over to.

Mr. KAHN. I am not speaking about cement here; I am speaking about cement in San Francisco, and the cement manufacturers of California do not belong to any trust. I desire to inform the gentleman and Members of this House that the cement-manufacturing companies in the State of California are selling cement as cheaply to-day as they were selling it before the catastrophe that occurred in that State. The only cement that has enhanced in price there is the foreign imported cement. The cement-manufacturing companies of California do not propose to raise the price of their manufacture. They have given assurances to that effect, and I do not think that we need have any fear on that ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman has said that they had given assurances. Of what character are these assurances—anything that would financially hold them?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think the gentlemen who are interested in the manufacture of cement in California could make such assurances and then go back on them and continue to live in California. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether they could live in California, but if the gentleman will pardon me it is ordinarily a trick of trade to keep reasonable until Congress adjourns when Congress could interfere with the exploitation of those people. I know nothing about the cement people of California; they may be the best people in the world; but the ordinary rule of business men in America is, I am sorry to say, to get as much as they can for any product, and the demand for cement will be enormously increased.

Mr. KAHN. I only want to say in reply to that that if any effort were made to increase the price beyond what it is to-day, and beyond what it is in other sections of the country, it will be only a matter of four or five months when Congress will reconvene, and I think I can safely say that the Republican majority on this floor would not consent to allow San Francisco to be mulcted in the price of cement or any other commodity that enters into the construction of her buildings. [Applause.]

Now, I want to say, in conclusion, there is no need to hold out false promises to the people of California. The California delegation in this House has discussed this matter repeatedly. They are not chasing rainbows. They are making an earnest, serious effort to accomplish results for their stricken communities. They saw no chance for the passage of such a bill at this session, and so they wisely determined to concentrate their efforts in the direction of legislation that held out the promise of success. The people of San Francisco want to commence rebuilding the magnificent city by the Golden Gate; they want to reestablish and maintain her in her proud position as the Queen of the Pacific; the delegation from California in this House, learning of the constitutional objections that were being raised against a drawback bill, concluded that it were best to notify our citizens that such legislation is impossible. And, Mr. Chairman, the failure of the passage of this bill will not delay the rehabilitation of San Francisco; it will not retard her growth; for her citizens, undismayed and undaunted, will build a more substantial, a more beautiful, a more magnificent San Francisco than the old. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] wishes to reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE], respecting the item in the bill paying $25,000 for traveling expenses of the President.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the idea, along that line.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to insert as a part of my remarks the report made in the Senate of the United States on January 20, 1873.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert as a part of his remarks the report referred to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall have no objection if the gentleman will put in at the same time the dissenting opinion by Senator Edmunds.

Mr. KAHN. I intended that in my original request.

The reports above referred to are as follows:

[Senate Report No. 311, Forty-second Congress, third session,]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 20, 1873.

Mr Carpenter submitted the following report to accompany bill H. R. 2993.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2993) entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in Boston," which act is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be allowed and paid, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, on all materials, except lumber, imported into the port and district of Boston and Charlestown, to be used, and actually used, in the construction and completion of buildings erected on the site of buildings burned by the fire of November 9 and 10, 1872, a drawback of the import duties paid on the same; and such drawback shall be allowed on such goods so imported and so used as shall be in warehouse on the day this act goes into effect: Provided, That said materials shall have been imported and used during the term of one year from and after the passage of this act"— respectfully submit the following report:

Your committee understand that this bill was referred to obtain their opinion in regard to its constitutionality; therefore only that question will be considered.

Whether the bill be constitutional or not depends upon the construction to be given to those provisions of the Constitution which relate to foreign commerce; and Boston, a great commercial metropolis, has an interest in the preservation of the integrity of the Constitution in this behalf far exceeding any benefit which might be derived by its citizens from the provisions of this bill.

The Constitution should be so construed as to give effect to the intention of its framers as evidenced by its language; and where its language is doubtful that intention may be ascertained by consulting the circumstances under which the Constitution was adopted, the evils which were found to exist under the previous confederation of States, and the objects intended to be secured by the "more perfect union" which the Constitution was designed to establish. It is well known that the interests of commerce formed one of the principal motives for adopting the Constitution. Thirteen or thirty-seven independent States, with thirteen or thirty-seven variant tariffs and conflicting commercial systems, would be disastrous to the commercial interests of our people. To avoid this, and to consolidate the States into one nation for the purposes of trade and commerce, was a great inducement to the adoption of the Constitution. And of all the ends secured by that instrument none is more prominent and none is guarded with greater solicitude than this, that all the States shall enjoy equal privileges of commerce. The Constitution protects inland States against exactions of States on the seaboard, and every seaboard State is protected against combinations of several States. Article I, section 8, provides:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

That is, all that may be done by Congress, in the way of providing by taxes and duties for paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, is subject to this limitation and qualification that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

To provide for the common defense and general welfare comprehends the whole duty of a national government, and if not even to secure this is it permitted by the Constitution to violate this rule of uniformity, it is clear that it may not be violated for temporary objects or to accomplish local purposes.

The Supreme Court of the United States, by Marshall, Chief Justice, has declared that the phrase "'throughout the United States' includes the District of Columbia and every spot and place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States."

Section 9 of the same article provides:

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

These provisions of the Constitution secure to every State all the advantages and subject it to all the burthens in regard to commercial regulations enjoyed and borne by other States of the Union. Speaking of the provision which requires uniformity in laying duties, Story (Comm. Const., section 957) says:

"It was to cut off all undue preferences of one State over another, in the regulation of subjects affecting their common interests. Unless duties, imposts, and excises were uniform, the grossest and most oppressive inequalities, vitally affecting the pursuits and employment of the people of different States, might exist. The agriculture, commerce, or manufactures of one State might be built up on the ruins of those of another; and a combination of a few States in Congress might secure a monopoly of certain branches of trade and business to themselves, to the injury, if not to the destruction, of their less-favored neighbors. The Constitution, throughout all its provisions, is an instrument of checks and restraints, as well as of powers. It does not rely on confidence in the General Government to preserve the interests of all the States. It is founded in a wholesome and strenuous jealousy, which, foreseeing the possibility of mischief, guards with solicitude against any exercise of power which may endanger the States, as far as it is practicable. If this provision as to uniformity of duties had been omitted, although the power might never have been abused to the injury of the feebler States of the Union (a presumption which history does not justify us in deeming quite safe or certain), yet it would of itself have been sufficient to demolish, in a practical sense, the value of most of the other restrictive clauses in the Constitution. New York and Pennsylvania might, by an easy combination with the Southern States, have destroyed the whole navigation of New England. A combination of a different character between the New England and the Western States might have borne down the agriculture of the South, and a combination of a yet different character might have struck at the vital interests of manufactures."

A construction of the Constitution which defeats its acknowledged purpose is a perversion of the Constitution; and any bill which would accomplish what the Constitution intended to prohibit is unconstitutional. The cunning with which a particular bill may be framed to avoid conflict with the Constitution, in language, will not rescue it from objection if the end it would accomplish be one which the Constitution forbids. This rule of constitutional construction has often been declared by the Supreme Court. In Bronson v. Kinsie, (1 How., 311), the Supreme Court, by Taney, C. J., in construing that provision of the Constitution which declares that no State shall impair the obligation of a contract, say:

"Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the State, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract. But if that effect is produced, it is immaterial whether it is done by acting on the remedy, or directly upon the contract itself. In either case it is prohibited by the Constitution."

And again they say:

"And no one, we presume, would say that there is any substantial difference between a retrospective law declaring a particular contract or class of contracts to be abrogated and void, and one which took away all remedy to enforce them, or encumbered it with conditions that render it useless or impracticable to pursue it."

The same principle is declared in Green v. Biddle (3 Wheat., 1), McCracken v. Hayward (2 How., 608), and in the Passenger cases (7 How., 283). Indeed, the principle is so obvious that it stands in no need of support by authority.

It is evident that a bill providing that imported articles shall pay a certain duty, but that the importer, on making proof to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that he has paid the duties, shall receive from the Treasury an amount equal to the duties paid, is equivalent to declaring that such articles shall be admitted free of duty. The constitution of several of the States declares that the rule of taxation shall be uniform; that is, that taxation shall bear equally upon all persons in proportion to the taxable property they possess. Therefore, a law which should declare that a certain class of persons—for instance, all lawyers, all physicians, or all merchants—should pay taxes, but on proof of payment should be entitled to receive from the Treasury an amount equal to the amount of taxes paid by them, would be a palpable evasion of the Constitution, and such act would be void. A payment made under an existing provision of law that the amount paid shall be immediately refunded is not a payment in any proper sense. Duties paid under such a provision of law are not paid at all. A debtor who passes money to his creditor with the right hand and takes it back with the left makes no payment.

Bearing these views in mind, let us consider this bill. It provides that there shall be allowed and paid, upon all materials imported into the ports and district of Boston and Charlestown, to be used, and actually used, in the construction and completion of buildings erected on the site of buildings burned by the fire of November 9 and 10, 1872, a drawback of the import duties paid on the same, provided that said materials shall have been imported and used during the term of one year from and after the passage of the act. The fire "of November 9 and 10, 1872," means not all fires which occurred in the United States on those days, but the fire which on those days occurred in Boston. If this bill be constitutional for one year, it would be for ten years or for all time. The question, therefore, is whether Congress can provide that certain articles imported at the port of Boston and used in that city shall be free of duty, while the same articles imported at the port of New York and used in that city, or imported at any other port of the United States and used in any part of the United States, shall pay a prescribed duty. In other words, the question is whether such a law imposes uniform duties throughout the United States and gives no preference to the port of Boston over the ports of other States. Of all questions submitted for discussion, one to which the answer is self-evident is the most difficult to deal with. And your committee are at a loss to determine what argument can make the conflict between this bill and the Constitution more evident than appears upon their face.

In the first place, the Constitution declares—

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

If the bill under consideration shall become a law it will be a part of the commercial system of the United States, and it will then, in effect, be provided that all building materials imported into the United States, and used in the city of Boston, shall pay a certain duty; provided, however, that if such articles shall be imported at the port of Boston, and used in that city, they shall be free of duty. The Constitution, in providing that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another, means, of course, that no regulation of commerce or revenue shall be made which shall render it more advantageous to the importer to enter his goods at one port than at another. If this bill shall become a law a merchant in Boston, wishing to rebuild his store in the burnt district, can import his materials duty-free at the port of Boston; but if he enters such materials at the port of New York, and conveys them by rail to Boston, he must pay a prescribed duty. If it can be maintained that a regulation of commerce which declares that goods imported at a specified port shall pay no duty, but if imported elsewhere shall pay duty, does not make a preference in favor of the port of free entry, then this bill goes clear of that objection. If a statement of this proposition does not suggest its unsoundness, your committee despair of showing the unconstitutionality of this bill.

But as that part of the bill which gives preference to the ports of Boston and Charlestown might be stricken out in the Senate, your committee proceed to consider whether the bill would be constitutional should it be thus amended.

The other provision of the Constitution is that "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

It is contended that if an article imported and entered at any port of the United States, but to be used for a certain purpose, be admitted free of duty, the rule of uniformity is not violated; and from this proposition it is argued that a law permitting building materials to be entered at any port of the United States free of duty, to be used in the city of Boston only, is constitutional. But it is believed by your committee that a slight examination of this conclusion will convince every one of its unsoundness.

Keeping in view the end which the Constitution intended to secure—that is, that all the States should be on an equal footing so far as duties, imposts, and excises are concerned—that the Constitution was intended to prevent the evil which would result to a particular State from the combination of other rival States, let us consider to what results the principle contended for leads.

If this bill be constitutional, then a similar bill in relation to any or all other imported articles would also be constitutional. If building materials, or other articles imported into the United States at any port, to be used in Boston, may be free of duty, then the provisions of the bill might be extended to articles to be used in the State of Massachusetts or all New England. And a law which should provide that all hides imported into the United States and manufactured into leather in New England, and all wool imported into the United States and manufactured into yarn or cloth in New England, should be exempted from duties otherwise imposed, would be constitutional. But what would be the practical result of such a law? Manifestly to give to New England the monopoly of woolen and leather manufacturers. It is contended that the rule of uniformity would not be violated by such a law, because a citizen of Wisconsin might import hides or wool at the port of Charleston, S. C., free of duty, provided he should transport the same to New England, and there manufacture them into leather or woolen cloth. But this is evidently sticking in the bark. Such a bill, if it conformed to the letter, would violate the spirit and defeat the purpose of the Constitution; for while the citizen of Wisconsin might enjoy the benefit of such a law by removing to New England, or conducting his business there, what would the State of Wisconsin say to a commercial reputation which should compel her citizens to transfer their capital and business to New England, or offer them a premium or inducement to do so? Or, to turn the point of this argument against New England, suppose Congress should pass a law that raw materials imported into the United States and manufactured in any part of the Union except New England, should be free of duties imposed as to New England, would not such discriminating law utterly ruin that flourishing manufacturing section? Could the tanners and shoemakers of Lynn pay any duty which Congress might choose to impose upon them, and still compete with other sections of the country paying no duties whatever? This would be the precise evil which Story says is prevented by this provision of the Constitution. Without this provision, he says:

"The agriculture, commerce, or manufactures of one State might be built up upon the ruins of those of another, and a combination of a few States in Congress might secure a monopoly of certain branches of trade and business to themselves to the injury, if not to the destruction, of their less-favored neighbors."

Chicago and St. Louis are rival cities. Suppose a bill to be passed by Congress providing that all building materials imported into the United States, and actually used in St. Louis, should be admitted for twenty-five years, or an indefinite time, free of duties imposed by law upon all building materials used in Chicago. Would not such a bill make a discrimination in favor of St. Louis most injurious to Chicago? Suppose a bill to pass Congress providing that all building materials or raw materials imported into the United States, and used or manufactured in the State of Pennsylvania, should be free of duties imposed upon all such materials imported into the United States, and used or manufactured in the State of New York. Is it not evident that the effect of such a law would be to give Philadelphia great advantages over New York? Or suppose a law to provide that all merchandise imported into the United States, provided it should be sold by retail, or in broken packages, in the State of Pennsylvania, should be free of duties imposed in all other cases. Would not such law destroy the commercial interests of New York? Certainly it would, if the duties generally imposed by law were high enough to present an inducement to the importer to pass by the port of New York and enter his goods at the free port of Philadelphia. Indeed it is too evident to require further illustration that, if Congress may pass this bill, it may pass a bill which, by its onerous duties and capricious exemptions, would divert commerce from one State to another at pleasure. And this is the very thing the Constitution was intended to prevent.

Your committee do not doubt that an act which should provide that materials imported and used to replace buildings destroyed by fire in any part of the United States; or a bill which should provide that hides and wool imported and manufactured into leather or cloth in any part of the United States, should be admitted free of duty; or on proof that the duties had been paid, the importer should be entitled to an equal amount from the Treasury, would be constitutional; would be constitutional, because it would be uniform in its operation and effect throughout the United States, and would give no preference to one State over another, nor tend to build up the manufacturing or commercial interests of one State at the expense of another. But, in the opinion of your committee, it can not be maintained that a commercial regulation is uniform throughout the United States which requires the citizens of the several States to remove their capital and business to a particular State to enjoy its benefits. When we consider that the States which formed the Union were rivals and jealous of each other; that one great motive to the formation of the Union and the adoption of the Constitution was to secure to all the States equal privileges and advantages in commerce and manufactures, and that two provisions were inserted in the Constitution to secure this end, your committee can not hesitate to declare that Congress has no power to pass this bill.

But it is said that the precedents support the bill. To this it may be answered, that the Constitution is an abiding and continuing command; and that nineteen violations of it will not justify the twentieth. It may be that unimportant bills have been passed by Congress which violate the principles of the Constitution in this respect; but it is believed that in all such cases, except one which will be hereafter particularly mentioned, the bills have passed without serious opposition, and, therefore, without full consideration. Instances may be found where Congress has authorized certain articles to be imported for particular colleges or charitable institutions free of duty; but in such cases the articles have been specified in the act, and the duty, which would otherwise have been collectible, was trifling. And it is believed that in none of these cases has the constitutional objection been urged or considered. It is a principle declared by all the courts that although a certain point was involved in the record, and in effect concluded by judgment, it is not to be regarded as a precedent in other cases, unless raised by counsel or expressly passed upon in the opinion of the court. This reasonable maxim of jurisprudence applies with full force to the bills above alluded to. That Congress has inadvertently passed one or many bills which conflict with a plain provision of the Constitution can afford no justification for the passage of another such bill against which the objection is raised, and brought clearly to the consideration and pressed upon the conscience of Congress.

A bill similar to the one under consideration was passed in the case of the fire at Portland; but it seems to have passed without consideration, certainly without discussion. The objection that it was unconstitutional was not raised by either House. A like bill was passed in the case of the Chicago fire, at the last session. This objection was made in the Senate. The bill was reported by the Committee on Finance, but was not considered by the Committee on the Judiciary; and it is fair to presume that the sympathy of Senators for the sufferers in that unparalleled calamity contributed more to the passage of the bill than the deliberate judgment of the Senate upon the constitutional question.

The occurrence of the Boston fire has brought the matter again to the consideration of Congress, and this is the first time your committee have been directed to consider the constitutionality of such a bill. The importance of the subject, and the fact that a calamity by fire can not be distinguished from one produced by a flood, a hurricane, an earthquake, or any other visitation outside of the ordinary course of things, and the fact that if Congress attempts to insure against one it must against all, not only justifies but calls for a reconsideration of the subject, and makes it necessary to determine the principles to be applied in all such cases. If, in view of all these considerations, Congress shall pass this bill, it is not perceived by your committee upon what ground Congress could refuse relief to individual sufferers. How many buildings must be destroyed to justify the interference of Congress? Must there be a thousand, or five hundred, or one hundred, or fifty, or five? Where is the line to be drawn? Must not Congress become the great almoner of the nation—a great insurance company for 40,000,000 of people?

An attempt is made to justify this bill upon the ground that it is substantially a drawback of duties; and it is said that drawbacks are as ancient as duties. To this two answers may be made; first, a drawback, as understood by all the commercial world, is a rebate of duties upon articles imported into, and subsequently exported in unbroken packages from a country. This is not a case of drawbacks; the provisions of the bill relate to articles to be used—that is, consumed—in this country.

In the second place, under our Constitution, drawbacks must be as uniform as duties. A law which should provide that all goods imported into, and exported in unbroken packages from, the State of New York should have a drawback of duties, without providing for such drawback in case of goods imported into and exported from the ports of other States, would make a preference in favor of the ports of the State of New York, and violate the rule requiring uniformity throughout the United States.

If it be said that the bill is in effect a mere appropriation of money out of the Treasury, and that Congress has a power of appropriation limited only by the fact that the appropriation must be made "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," the answer is plain. The bill does not provide for paying any debt or for anything necessary to the common defense. Nor is it an appropriation for the "general welfare." The bill is essentially a local measure. But, in the language of Story, "a power to lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is not in common sense a general power. It is limited to those objects. It can not constitutionally transcend them. If the defense proposed by a tax be not the common defense of the United States, if the welfare be not general, but special or local, as contradistinguished from national, it is not within the scope of the Constitution." (1 Story's Com. on Con., sec. 922.)

It requires no argument to show that the power of appropriation is no broader than that of taxation; and therefore, as Congress can not lay taxes for a merely local purpose as contradistinguished from a national one by taxation, so it can not appropriate money for such local purpose.

Upon the best consideration they have been able to give to this subject, your committee are compelled to report that the bill under consideration violates both the provisions of the Constitution above quoted, and ought not to pass.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 20, 1873.

Mr. Edmunds, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of the minority on the bill entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in Boston:"

The purpose of referring this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary is understood to have been to obtain its views respecting the constitutionality of laws of this character. This question of constitutionality arises chiefly, and perhaps in a mere legal sense entirely, under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, the first clause of which reads as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Another clause gives Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Another clause gives it the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

One clause of section 9 declares that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken."

Another clause declares that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

And still another declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

The power of laying duties, etc., conferred by the first clause above quoted, has been held to refer exclusively to the taxing power, and not to the power to regulate commerce. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)

The chief question, then, is whether a bill which, for a particular purpose and in a particular emergency, is believed by Congress to be one promotive of the "general welfare of the United States," and which proposes in substance to remit the "duties, imposts, and excises" upon a particular class of property designed for particular use, and which the bill authorizes to be brought into any port of the United States, by any citizen of the United States, for that object, is in conflict with the provision that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Literally, it would seem that no such objection could possibly be raised, unless the use to which the goods authorized to be imported everywhere by every citizen is to be taken as a controlling element in the question of uniformity. To hold this would seem also to require that in every case, in order to the uniformity, the duties on property imported should be imposed without variation as to rate or exception as to things.

Although little, if any, light is thrown upon the design of the framers of the Constitution in inserting this clause in its recorded discussions upon the subject, yet it seems manifest that the object was to prevent a majority of the States from oppressing some one or more of the other States by imposing heavier duties upon articles imported into them than upon those imported elsewhere. It could not have been thought necessary that the majority of the States should be deprived of the power to injure themselves by imposing in a particular State a lower rate of duty than that imposed in all the others. It must have been presumed that the States and their representatives would act for the protection of their own interests, and that combinations which might be formed would be formed against the few, rather than by the few against the many.

We come, then, to consider what is the true import of the phrase "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." This is a phrase of limitation, and, upon settled principles of interpretation, it ought not to be extended beyond the fair import of the words used. The uniformity here required must evidently be a uniformity in respect to the objects upon which duties are to be imposed and the persons by whom those duties are to be paid. To say that the phrase has a more extensive meaning than this would make it import that one single rate of duty should be imposed upon every article brought into the country, without exception and without any qualification derived from the obvious political necessities of the times. That no such construction has ever been contended for, and that the universal practice of the Government has been the reverse of it, is sufficient evidence to show that the meaning of the terms must be limited as we have stated.

If, then this uniformity applies only to the imposition upon the particular subject of the law imposing the duty and the class of persons who may bring it into the country, it would seem to follow inevitably that if all goods imported for a particular purpose bear the same rate of duty or bear none at all, and all citizens are given the right to import them for that purpose, the law is not infringed by the fact that it happens that the particular purpose which is made the test of importations of that character is one which must be exercised in a particular place or by a particular class of people. It was perfectly well known to the framers of the Constitution, as it is to us, that the varieties of climate, occupation, and industry in the country were so great that necessarily particular classes of objects which might be brought from abroad would be used exclusively in particular States or sections of the country, and that other particular classes would be used in other States or sections of the country. It was impossible then to look, so far as the uniformity of imposition was concerned, to the uses to which goods imported should be appropriated; and if the right to import particular things might be exercised by all citizens alike, and in all parts alike, the security designed by the Constitution was accomplished without undertaking to see to it that each State of the Union should consume or buy more or less of the things thus brought in.

If it be the judgment of Congress that the general welfare will be promoted by the free importation of goods to be used for a particular purpose, in a particular place, not because it is a particular place or in a particular State, but because the object to which they are to be devoted happens by accident to be one to be effectuated in some one State or place, there can be said to be no preference to that State or place as such, although the same goods and for the same purpose could not be used on that occasion in any other State or place. Its real spirit and essence in such a case is not to interfere with uniformity or to create a preference between States or ports, but it is to accomplish the general welfare by aiding a particular object or a special enterprise which must of necessity be located somewhere, and not everywhere, in the country.

While, as we have seen, therefore, such a law does not violate the letter of the Constitution, it is equally clear that it does not violate its spirit, which, as we have seen, was to prevent the oppression of a particular State for the benefit of the others, and not to prevent Congress, when the general welfare required it, from allowing all the citizens of the country to bring in goods in aid of some special object which happened to be attainable only by their use in a particular case.

It was seen evidently by the framers of the Constitution that this first clause of section 8 would not prevent Congress from indirectly giving the preference to a particular port even; and in order to exclude such an exercise of the power conferred by this clause it was provided in the next section that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." Were the construction of the first clause of section 8 by those who believed such bills to be unconstitutional the correct one, there would have been no necessity for the qualifying provision found in section 9.

The same word, "uniform," is used in the same section as applied to naturalization. And yet Congress in early days exercised without question the power of providing that, in a special instance and for a particular purpose, certain persons should be naturalized ipso facto, although at the same time, by the general laws of naturalization, all other aliens were subjected to a probation. Such was the act of March 26, 1804 (2 Stat., 292), which provided—

"That any alien, being a free white person, who was residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States at any time between the 18th day of June, 1798, and the 14th of April, 1802, and who has continued to reside within the same, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States without a compliance with the first condition specified in the first section of the naturalization act."

And the second section of the same act provided—

"That when any alien who shall have complied with the first condition specified in the first section of such original act, and who shall have pursued the directions prescribed in the second section of said act, may die before he is actually naturalized, the widow and children of such alien shall be considered as citizens of the United States, and shall be entitled to all rights and privileges as such upon taking the oaths prescribed by law."

The condition referred to was in the act of April 14, 1802, and required a declaration of intention to become a citizen, to be made three years at least before his admission as such.

A provision in the fourth section of the act of 1802, of a similar character, naturalizing by mere act of law certain alien children then in the United States, was carried into effect by the Supreme Court, without any doubt being suggested that by such special provisions for special cases the requirement of uniformity was not obeyed. (Campbell v. Gordon, 6 Cranch, 176.)

In these instances it will be perceived that Congress and the Supreme Court thought that uniformity was retained under the Constitution, if it existed in respect to the particular subject or thing embraced in the particular enactment, although in general, and as to all other persons and things, another provision existed.

A long series of acts of legislation upon the subject of duties, imposts, and excises, beginning with the early history of the Government, seems to us to involve precisely the same principles, and to give a practical construction to this clause of the Constitution in favor of the validity of such laws. The following are some of the instances of the kind:

In the duties act of 1790 (1 Stat., p. 177, sec. 70), it was provided that—

"No goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, subject to the payment of duties, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place in any other manner than by sea, nor in any ship or vessel of less than 30 tons burden, except within the district of Louisville, etc."

This instance would seem at first view to go so far even as to evade the prohibition against the preference to ports; but it was probably thought valid, on the ground that no particular port or ports were named, and as the design of the statute was not to accomplish such preferences, but only for particular reasons affecting the general welfare, to provide a special rule for a particular district.

The fishery drawbacks in the act of 1792, and other acts, seem to a certain degree to fall within the same principle.

The act of February 27, 1793 (1 Stat., 324), provided for the free admission of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, and other useful beasts imported for breed.

The act of March 7, 1794 (1 Stat., 342), proceeded specially upon the grounds we have before stated. The preamble recites that—

"Whereas the disastrous situation in the town of Cape Francois, in the island of Hispaniola, compelled sundry vessels belonging to citizens of the French Republic, in the month of June last, to take refuge within the ports of the United States;

"And whereas they are liable by law to the payment of foreign tonnage, which, considering the necessity of their case, ought equitably to be remitted to them."

And it then proceeded to enact such remission.

It would certainly be a very narrow line of argument to hold that Congress may constitutionally remit a particular duty due upon a vessel which has entered one of its ports, but may not declare in advance that if a particular vessel does enter the duty shall be remitted. If such a distinction were sound, it would follow that Congress might constitutionally remit all duties due from all citizens of a particular State for the mere reason that they were citizens of that State, which will scarcely be maintained.

The true test evidently is that, consistently with the letter of the Constitution, the validity of the law is to be tested by the real purpose and spirit of its enactment. If that purpose be to promote the general welfare by relieving distress or encouraging a particular enterprise, and not to aid classes of citizens because of their territorial location, the law must be valid.

The act of June 4, 1794 (1 Stat., 372), provided—

"That in all cases where the term allowed by law for the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise, with the benefit of a drawback of the duties thereupon, shall have expired after the last day of January last past, and previous to the last day of July next, there shall be allowed further time for the exportation with the benefit aforesaid, until the last day of July next."

This provision, and all the others looking to the past instead of the future, would be much more objectionable than a bill such as that now proposed, for the reason that only the particular persons who had already imported goods could be benefited, instead of its giving an equal privilege to all citizens of the United States who might choose to import goods for the special purpose authorized by law.

Another act of June 4, 1794 (1 Stat., 373), directed the collector of the district of Pennsylvania to take a bond for the payment of duties accruing on teas imported in the ship Argonaut from China, payable on a particular day, thus making an exception from the general provisions upon that subject in favor of a particular ship and for a particular time.

The act of January 28, 1795 (1 Stat., 410), provided that—

"The duties on the tonnage of sundry shallops and small schooners lately employed to convey to Boston a number of French citizens, late inhabitants of St. Peter and Miquelon, from Halifax and Shelburne, in Nova Scotia, where they had been sent prisoners by the British during the present war, be, and the same are hereby, remitted."

Here was a specific instance of the remission of duties upon vessels on account of their particular occupation, although they had entered at one single port, which had thereby obtained the advantages to be derived from such entrance. But as the purpose of the act was not to prefer Boston to other ports, or these vessels to other vessels merely, but to show a patriotic appreciation of loyalty under circumstances of distress, its constitutional propriety was not questioned.

By the act of June 1, 1796 (1 Stat., 494), relief was provided for such owners of stills as should make it appear that within a particular period of time they had not been able to work their stills during that time by the destruction or the failure of fruit or grain, or any other unavoidable cause; and such distillers were given an election to pay, in lieu of the ordinary and general duty upon the yearly capacity of their stills, a monthly duty of 10 cents per gallon for the time their stills were actually employed.

By the act of February 19, 1803 (2 Stat., 201), relief was granted to sufferers by fire at Portsmouth, by extending the time for discharging their custom-house bonds.

By the act of March 19, 1804 (2 Stat., 272), the sufferers by the fire at Norfolk were permitted to cancel their bonds given for duties to the collector, and to substitute therefor new bonds, with further indulgence as to time of payment.

By the act of March 3, 1817 (3 Stat., 369), the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to remit to any person to whom a license upon a still had been granted before the 1st July, 1816, for a term extending beyond said day, who should prove to his satisfaction that he had discontinued the use of such still, such proportion of the duties thereon as should be just.

By the act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat., 465), the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to remit all alien or discriminating duties, either upon tonnage or merchandise imported in respect of British vessels which have been entered in ports of the United States at any time between the 3d day of July and the 18th August, 1815.

By the act of 24th February, 1820 (3 Stat., 543), remission was made of "the duties which have accrued or may accrue to the United States upon the importation of a statue of George Washington, by order and for the use of the State of North Carolina."

By the act of 19th January, 1824 (4 Stat., 3), the Secretary of the Treasury was "authorized and required to refund to the distillers of spirituous liquors within the county of Berks, in the State of Pennsylvania, who, at any time since the 1st of January, 1814, have used the stills made according to" a certain improvement. This act, on its passage, was the subject of much discussion as to its propriety, but no question was made respecting its constitutionality. (See Annals of 18th Cong., vol. 1, p. 910.)

By the act of 26th May, 1824, the same relief was extended to all persons similarly situated. (4 Stat., 44.)

By the act of 19th March, 1836 (5 Stat., 6), which was entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York," an extension of the time of payment upon duty bonds was given "to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the conflagration at that place on the 16th day of December last by the burning of their buildings or merchandise;" with a proviso that the benefits of the section should not be extended to any person whose loss by such fire was less than $1,000. And by the second section of the same act a similar extension was provided upon all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York prior to the fire, for a shorter period of time, excepting such bonds as had fallen due before the 17th day of December then last past.

By the act of July 7, 1838, it was directed that the duties should be remitted upon all goods, wares, and merchandise destroyed in unbroken and original packages by the great conflagration which took place in the city of New York on the 16th and 17th December, 1835. And by the same act it was further provided that certificates given by the collector and naval officer of that port to persons, showing how much money they had paid upon goods so destroyed, should be received instead of cash in the payment of duties upon goods to be imported. In this instance it will be perceived that, besides the ordinary relief given by remission, in the various cases above referred to, it was provided that while all the other citizens of the United States must pay their duties in coin, the particular sufferers by that fire might pay their duties by these certificates. This provision seems to come much nearer a want of uniformity than any of the others.

By the act of March 3, 1839, "for the relief of umbrella makers," a special remission and refunding of duties was provided to those who had imported umbrella stretchers within a certain period of time named.

The well-remembered act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat., 304), "for the relief of sufferers by fire at Portland," provided that all gratuitous contributions to the sufferers should enter that port duty free, and also that on all materials actually used in buildings erected on the ground burned over a drawback of import duties should be paid, provided said material should have been imported at the port of Portland during the year ended July 5, 1867.

By joint resolution of 20th July, 1868 (15 Stat., 260), vessels of the United States touching at or near ports in Canada under certain circumstances were exempt from the payment of tonnage fees to the consuls of the United States, as required by the general laws applying to all other vessels; the reason for the exception being that those vessels made these ports on their voyages from one port of the United States to another, although the same reason would apply to a vessel sailing from New York to New Orleans and touching at Habana.

By joint resolution passed July 23, 1868 (15 Stat., 260), it was provided that—

"The statue representing the figure of Victory, intended to surmount the monument in memory of the Pennsylvania soldiers who fell in the Mexican war, now about being erected on the capitol grounds at Harrisburg, being in marble, cut in Italy, and which will soon be ready for shipment, shall be admitted free of duty."

By joint resolution passed March 3, 1869 (15 Stat., 349), the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to remit duties on a meridian circle imported for the observatory at Cambridge, Mass., and also upon one imported for the observatory of the Chicago University, at Chicago, Ill.

The instance of the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the Chicago fire is too familiar to need further reference.

At this present session of Congress an act has been passed providing that a certain distiller in Tennessee might carry on his business upon property of which he was not the owner, although all other distillers are required by general law to be the owners in fee of such property.

And a bill has also passed allowing the admission, free of duty, of certain articles to be used in the construction of a monument at Annapolis.

Other instances of a similar character to those above recited can no doubt be found, but enough have been named to show the uniform course of legislation bearing in a greater or less degree upon the true construction of the provision of the Constitution now brought into question. It appears to us that these acts of legislation, or most of them, can only be upheld upon the principle we have stated in the outset, and that they furnish a clear legislative exposition of the true scope and purpose of this constitutional requirement as understood from the foundation of the Government to this time, the essential idea being that the test of uniformity is answered by the application of the rule to the particular thing upon which the duty or impost is laid in the given case named in the law, without looking to the fact that its ultimate use or destination may happen to be one which indirectly or incidentally works a benefit to a particular town or a particular State.

So long as the manifest object of the law is not to confer an advantage or preference upon one State or place because it is such a State or place, but is to promote the general welfare by giving aid to a particular class of citizens who are in distress, and who must of necessity reside in some State and in some place, even if it could be maintained successfully (which does not seem to us to be true) that the Constitution, read without the light of experience and practice, does not permit such assistance to be rendered to citizens, the long and uniform practical construction which has been given to it in favor of bills of this character ought to be decisive upon this point. It is a familiar principle of interpretation that a contemporaneous construction of the Constitution and long practice and acquiescence therein are usually the conclusive guides to its meaning. (Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299.)

In the report of the majority of the committee all distinction between the remission of duties in consequence of the character of the use of the thing imported, which in this case, and remissions in consequence of the place of such or any use, seems to be ignored, and the bill is treated entirely as if it were a bill declaring that "all goods used in Boston" should have a drawback. An argument directed against such a proposition has, we think, no application to the present case.

The majority of the committee appear also to be of opinion that the Constitution requires uniformity of effect throughout the United States in the imposition of duties, etc. The Constitution does not so declare. It declares that "all duties, imposts, and excises," not the effect or object of them, but the duties, etc., themselves, "shall be uniform," etc.

The test of uniformity, therefore, must in the legal aspect of the matter be applied to the act of importation and to the terms imposed upon that. The destined use of the goods is merely a descriptive means of identifying the class of things to which a special rate of duty or an entire remission of it is applied in the law.

In respect to the opinion of the majority of the committee that the precedents referred to are of little weight, for the reason that usually the constitutional question was not raised, it is enough to say that in all these instances the bills were special, and the question manifest upon the face and in the very nature of the subjects; so that the absence of discussion or dispute makes a stronger practical construction of the Constitution in favor of the power of Congress to pass such bills. It is true, as is claimed, that no number of violations of the Constitution can justify another; but it is also true that, in seeking for the true interpretation of that instrument, a particular signification, long imputed to it and acted upon without question for a great length of time, is of the utmost importance, not to justify its violation, but in order to know its true meaning. Such is the imperfection of language and such is the variety of mental constitution among men that any other rule would make the Constitution the most uncertain and changeable of laws; it would be held in one year and by one Congress to authorize acts which in the next year and by the next Congress it would be held to forbid.

As we have already suggested, the rule of uniformity may be answered by a law that infringes the clause of the Constitution forbidding preferences being given by any regulation of revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. In the bill before us we think that the provision in it requiring the importation in question to be made into the ports of Boston and Charleston only, does infringe the clause last referred to, and that the same ought to be stricken out.

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS.
GEORGE G. WRIGHT.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman has no right to put a condition upon a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman making the request has the right to determine what it shall be for himself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may continue not longer than fifteen minutes, and I probably shall not occupy more than ten.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, away back in the earlier and sometimes called the better days of the Republic there was a campaign waged in this country for President of the United States, the two leading candidates being William Henry Harrison and Martin Van Buren. I am going briefly into an incident or two of that campaign to show that while we may not be getting any better, while we may not be getting any lower down, we are certainly no worse in our use of doubtful weapons of political warfare than our ancestors. There was at that time a suspicion upon the minds of one of the elements in this country that Martin Van Buren had become indoctrinated with the ideas of monarchy and aristocracy and plutocracy and all kinds of ocracies that were inimical to the growth and perpetuity of our free institutions, and so severe was the criticism that thousands of men voted for Mr. Harrison with the belief that the election of Van Buren would turn over the Government to an alliance with Great Britain, which was to be ratified and cemented and promoted by the marriage of a member of the Van Buren household with a daughter of the kingly Government of Great Britain. At a great political meeting that was held in furtherance of the purposes of that campaign a great Whig orator was urged to a fearful point of mental excitement by attacks upon the White House and its administration. The old story of the gold plate, which was familiar to men of that day, was brought out, revarnished, and used for illustration, and finally, when the audience had become thoroughly hysterical, he took a coin out of his pocket on which was a female figure and at the foot of the female figure was a liberty cap. That coin has pretty well gone out of circulation in the United States to-day. He declared, Mr. Chairman, with the greatest vehemence, that so far had Martin Van Buren progressed in his proposed alliance with Great Britain and the overthrow of the political institutions of our country that he had changed the coinage and had taken the liberty cap off the head of the female and placed it at her "dirty feet." [Laughter.] As a matter of course, Van Buren was defeated. I was only about 6 years old at that time. I did not hear that speech, but it has been repeated a thousand times in my hearing by those who did hear it—a hundred times; no, twenty times. [Laughter.] Well, Mr. Chairman, we have lived all these years; I have grown to be an old man; and here we have on the floor of the House an assault upon the White House because they want a clean horse stable and other reasonable facilities at the home of the President.

Mr. Chairman, here we are talking of the beef-packing industries of this country because there is an odor that comes up from them which is offensive to the nostrils of some of the polite young gentlemen who have been detailed for the inspection of those institutions, and at the same time we hear an assault upon the President's household. I do not suppose, as a matter of fact, that the President had anything in the world to do with the suggestion about the new horse stable—he may have had. If so, he was right about it. We assail the Administration because somebody has suggested that it would be wise to have a stable where these inspectors, in the moments of their retirement from the inspection of the beef-packing institutions, could go and admire the symmetry and beauty of horses without any further offense to their refined olfactories. This kind of warfare is a relic of antiquity. It is not indulged in nowadays, except as an experiment, a sort of mental acrobatic, gymnastic feature of attack. It can have no effect upon the American people; and I want to say this now, and I am glad to say it upon my own motion, that if I were to attempt by an illustrated lecture to impress upon the people of the Old World, the best of them, the most intelligent of them, the most highly educated—if I were attempting to impress upon them the absolute domination of plain, everyday, democratic living and plain democratic administration of a great government, if I wanted to place the highest object lesson that it is possible to place before a class of students upon that particular topic, I would take them to the White House, the home of the President, the home of his family, the home of the executive department of this Government, and show them the everyday life of the occupant, for the time being, of the Presidential chair [applause on the Republican side]—show them his incoming and outgoing, and I speak of him now as simply the type of the American President—show him in his daily walks among his fellow-citizens, a man, a simple American citizen without a single signification of greatness by reason of his high office, without any insignia of the idea of extravagance in living, in pomp or circumstances of place—the plain American administrator of the plain American Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would point to him as he meets his fellow-citizens, from the highest to the lowest, and discusses with them the passing events of the day, as he meets them upon the common ground of intelligence and interest as citizens.

I would point to his children attending the public schools; I would point to his traveling and commingling with his fellow-citizens throughout the country; I would take them to the White House, on those festal occasions when the American people are assembled there to meet the Chief Magistrate of the country and his family, and point out as illustrative of the highest development of true American publicity all that can be seen on an occasion like that. Whatever criticism can be made of our Government, it has not developed aristocracy and plutocracy. Whatever may be said about the accumulation of riches in the hands of some people and their attempt at display, nothing of the kind has ever come near the headquarters of the American Republic. No President of the United States has ever been unseemly in his airs and attitude in his official position [applause], and it has been and is to-day the wonder and surprise of the people of foreign nations that the American President to-day is a plain American citizen of to-day. Twenty-five thousand dollars for traveling expenses! It is a contemptible sum in amount for the purpose; a criticism of it is unjustifiable and unfortunate. The American President travels about the country. We criticised one President once because he had not traveled enough. We have one now who has covered more territory to which the Constitution goes ex propria vigore than any of his predecessors, and we are glad of that. It is one bright spot in our situation that our President knows something of all the dominion over which the flag flies. But somebody here in Congress has proposed to allow him $25,000, or to allow $25,000 to be expended in sending him about over the country to visit his fellow-citizens. Is it possible that there lives on earth a man who begrudges that appropriation? Is there a man who doubts its propriety? Is there a man who does not say amen to it? If there is I have yet to meet him. How many horses the President rides, that seems to be an issue. Well, some Presidents did not ride horses at all. They could not, if the horse was nervous and excitable. I like a President who can ride not only one horse, but half a dozen horses [applause]—not all at once, nor going different ways, but a President who likes a horse of high metal, to correspond with its rider; and I think the American people do not criticise, never have criticised, an American President for that. I knew one President, whom I have heard criticised because he never knew the difference between a poor horse and a good one, and was always being swindled by some horse sharper. I am glad to see a President reach that height of efficiency that he can not be cheated by a horse jockey; I think it is a great thing. [Applause.] So, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country do not condemn, but admire, the Administration of the White House. The American people do not condemn, but approve, of the expenditures of money for the White House. Go up there. I should like to take the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE] with me, and take a quiet walk through the White House. That is the home of the President. It has been the home of the President since the days of Washington. I hope it may be the home of the President until the dawn of eternity. [Applause.] It is the old White House of our ancestors. I believe in it; I do not want to see it changed to a palace somewhere. [Applause.] I want to see that plain, unadorned, dignified, but simple, house of the President, to which the people can come as they can now, through which they may wander and admire its symmetry and beauty and reflect upon its historical significance, and I deny that the American people will criticise the President of the Republican party or the Democratic party or any other party, who comes to the White House and lives in the light and under the example that has been set by the present and former Presidents of the United States. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For Treasury building at Washington, D. C.: For repairs to Treasury, Butler, and Winder buildings, $18,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement. A few moments ago the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] rose to have the Senate report by Senator Carpenter and others made a part of the RECORD of to-morrow. At the same time I rose for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have the minority report of Judge Edmunds and Judge Wright put in the RECORD AS PART OF MY REMARKS or of his, and it seems that some gentlemen have made objection to the position I took, saying I was trying to mold the speech of the gentleman from California. Nothing was more foreign to my thought. I am only too glad to have the valuable document in the RECORD, along with the very valuable opinion rendered by Judge Edmunds and Judge Wright, two of our great lawyers and great Senators.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to talk for five minutes on matters other and different from those contained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I find on looking at the annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year 1905 that the number of persons on the pay rolls of the railways of the United States, as reported for June 30, 1904, was 1,296,121.

The House, Mr. Chairman and fellow-members of the committee, will be held responsible by the country for the legislation thus far enacted in depriving those men and their families of free transportation on the railways of this country. The Senate, in the bill passed by that body, provided for that. The House in its bill, H. R. 12987, did not refer to transportation of any kind for railway employees. The amendment prepared and passed by the Senate made provision for transportation for those employees. It would have remained in the bill if the House had not, by its action, forced the conferees of the Senate to abandon that amendment. The people may want to know why the Senate did not insist on this amendment. So that the condition stands before the country. The Senate put it in; the House has stricken it out, and we, my fellow-Members, will be called to the bar of account for that by the people this fall when they vote.

What further have we done? There was a provision placed in the bill by the Senate, an amendment, including those engaged in shipping live stock and giving them transportation from the point going to and the point returning, where they were necessarily engaged in looking after their stock. The House insisted that that provision put in by the Senate go out, and it went out on account of the action of the House conferees; and we will be held responsible to the country for striking that out of the bill.

What further has been done? The same bill came from the other body with an amendment in it as follows:

The term "common carrier," as used in this act, shall include express companies and sleeping-car companies.

The House has refused thus far to include sleeping-car companies in the bill. What justification, my countrymen, can we give to our people when we go before them this fall and say we have included twelve express companies under the law and we refuse to include at the same time in the same law the only known monopoly in the United States that has no opposition of any kind or character, namely, the Pullman Palace Car Company? [Applause.] The people may be a little curious to know why the Senate receded from this amendment, and explanations may be in order.

Now, there is only one way to reach questions of this kind. There is no use talking about President Van Buren and whether his niece or nephew wanted to do something or other. That has long since passed. Let us meet the live issues. What have we to say to the country upon our action in this matter? For one, I voted against sending the bill to conference and insisted on holding in our hands the right to concur or nonconcur in this body. It was not a party question; never has been a party question in this House. Our friends upon this side of the House, as well as my side of the House, practically unanimously voted for this railway rate measure, sending it to the other body, and that other body practically unanimously voted for the amended measure and sent it back here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PRINCE. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRINCE. There is only one thing for this House to do, and that is when this conference report comes into this House vote it down. [Applause.] Then it is in our hands to do as we please with it. Then I would concur in the amendments, every one that the House conferees have concurred in, and in addition to them I would put sleeping cars under control of the common-carrier system in this country. Now, what have we? Here in the report of this Interstate Commerce Commission there is not a word with reference to the Pullman Palace Car Company, no control of any kind or character; no report made to the country or to the House, and we have this anomalous condition. A strong monopoly—not a trust, but a monopoly that our party and our people want controlled—left absolutely without control by this House, and thus far the House seems to concur in leaving or allowing this monopoly to do as it pleases. There are only two railroads in this country that I find have their own sleeping cars. One is the East Florida Coast Line, a short line, and the Great Northern. If this law is enacted and this company is left out, it can destroy the privilege and right of any railroad company operating any sleeping cars of its own. It can control them. It could get some one to go before the Commission and make complaint of any railroad company that has its own sleeping cars and fixes the rates on their own line, because they are common carriers; and you may blot them out if it appears that they are unequal or unjust; but you can not appear before the Commission, if the rate of this monopoly is too high, and have it brought before the law, because you have excluded it, and you see the position we are in when we go before our fellow-men this fall. I believe the next House will be Republican. We have much-needed legislation to pass now. We do want to pass proper meat-inspection laws. We do not want to be responsible for failure to pass a pure-food law before we adjourn. That is up to us, and a live issue. [Applause.]

Now, I am frank to say that the Pullman company makes no report to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is not primarily amenable to the interstate law. It is possible that the Commission might regulate the rates of sleeping cars by holding railroads responsible for such charges, but this is by no means certain.

The matter should be definitely and clearly settled by placing sleeping cars under the interstate-commerce law, and parlor cars should likewise be included. And for one I give notice now that I shall vote against concurring in this conference report. I hope that something may be done, and if not here, then elsewhere, that this whole matter may be sent again to the conferees; and if they come in here leaving out the sleeping-car companies, if they come in here refusing to grant free transportation to railway officers, men, and employees and members of their families, if they come in here refusing to grant free transportation to stockmen necessarily in charge of stock in transit, I for one give notice that I will vote against concurring in such a conference report. I want to give notice in advance and state to the country and to my constituents my position before this matter comes up. I hope the House will insist upon its rights. I hope it will no longer hand over to conferees the prerogatives that it should exercise, but that it will hold itself responsible, as we will be held responsible to our people individually for our votes here in this House. When this conference report comes in, if it does not contain the provisions to which I have referred, I hope it will be voted down. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I am interested in having the House proceed with this bill, because the committee of which I am a member are desirous of getting the pure-food bill before the House for its consideration. The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. TAWNEY] gave notice that he would confine the debate to the items in the bill. If that be his purpose, very well. If that be not his purpose, I shall use such means as are in my power to attain that end.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is my purpose from this time on to confine the debate to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism of what has been done.

Mr. TAWNEY. Several gentlemen spoke to me yesterday when we were endeavoring to close general debate, each of whom wanted five or ten minutes to-day under the five-minute rule, and in order to effect what I was endeavoring to accomplish I gave consent to those gentlemen that they should have the time they desired; but from this time on I trust I may be able to confine the debate to the provisions of the bill as they are reached.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, while we were in the House I understood the gentleman to say that there should be the fullest debate on the bill itself.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the five-minute rule on the bill. I am now speaking about matters foreign to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then there will not be any objection upon the gentleman's part for extensions of time for matters contained in the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. On matters relating to provisions of the bill there will be reasonable time.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman from Illinois is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. In view of some adverse editorial criticisms of the position of the pure-food bill, it seems that there are some statements being made throughout the country that it is the purpose of the so-called administration of the House, and perhaps of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, not to consider the pure-food bill at this session of Congress. I have investigated the matter to some extent and I am convinced that that is incorrect. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not the purpose of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, as far as he knows, of the officers of this House, to give consideration to that bill fully at this session of Congress?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to violate the very rule which I shall endeavor to enforce, but I will say that certainly, in my opinion, it is the intention of the House to consider and pass a pure-food bill, and I have no doubt it will become a law at this session of Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I want to say a word about this matter. I have seen and heard of criticisms on the part of gentlemen for fear that the pure-food bill would not be considered. Some gentlemen who voted against the consideration of that bill the other day when I myself attempted to get consideration of it, or, rather, gentlemen who voted in favor of taking up another proposition that excluded it, have been quite busy in their comments since that time. It is no fault of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that that matter has not yet been considered. That committee reported the bill many weeks since. This House elected to take up that very important matter, the naturalization bill, and spent days upon that, instead of the pure-food bill, when the alternative was offered, and some of the same gentlemen who aided in that have been vociferous in their criticism of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for not getting the pure-food bill before the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if my friend from Minnesota will permit me to proceed just for a minute, when the House met this morning I was absent, discharging a duty that the House had imposed upon me as a member of the committee to attend the funeral of Senator GORMAN. My good friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] called attention to the fact that the RECORD of this morning was interpreted to disclose that he has been credited with some remarks that I made yesterday, and the gentleman was kind enough to have the matter cleared up. I am certainly glad he did it, because if I had been present and had thought that what I said had been accredited to my friend from Nebraska, I myself would have been the first person to see that he should not receive the credit of it. I am rather proud that I made the speech, and thank the gentleman for making the correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations, including the old Chicago station, at the uniform rate of $65 per month each during the period of actual employment, and $3 per day for each occasion of service at other times; compensation of volunteers at life-saving and lifeboat stations for actual and deserving service rendered upon any occasion of disaster or in any effort to save persons from drowning, at such rate, not to exceed $10 for each volunteer, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; pay of volunteer crews for drill and exercise; fuel for stations and houses of refuge; repairs and outfits for same; rebuilding and improvement of same, including use of additional land where necessary; supplies and provisions for houses of refuge and for shipwrecked persons succored at stations; traveling expenses of officers under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters and purchase of fuel in kind for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service; for carrying out the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the act approved May 4, 1882; for draft animals and their maintenance; for telephone lines and care of same; and contingent expenses, including freight, storage, rent, repairs to apparatus, labor, medals, stationery, newspapers for statistical purposes, advertising, and all other necessary expenses not included under any other head of life-saving stations on the coasts of the United States, $1,602,850.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking what is the necessity of putting in the words "including the old Chicago station?"

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the language that has heretofore been employed in this bill. I am not advised of any reason for a change and consequently made no change.

The Clerk read as follows:

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

For expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service: For pay and allowances of captains, lieutenants, engineer in chief, chief engineers, assistant engineers, and constructor, Revenue-Cutter Service, cadets, commissioned surgeon; two contract surgeons, two civilian instructors, one at $1,800 and one at $1,500, and pilots employed, and rations for the same; for pay of warrant and petty officers, ships' writers, buglers, seamen, oilers, firemen, coal heavers, water tenders, stewards, cooks, and boys, and for rations for the same; for fuel for vessels, and repairs and outfits for the same; ship chandlery and engineers' stores for the same; actual traveling expenses or mileage, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for officers traveling on duty under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters; for maintenance of vessels in the protection of the seal fisheries in Bering Sea and the other waters of Alaska, and the enforcement of the provisions of law in Alaska; for maintenance of vessels in enforcing the provisions of the acts relating to the anchorage of vessels in the ports of New York and Chicago, approved May 16, 1888, February 6, 1893, and March 3, 1899; and an act relating to the anchorage and movement of vessels in St. Marys River, approved March 6, 1896; and an act relating to the anchorage of vessels in the Kennebec River at or near Bath, Me., approved June 6, 1900; for temporary leases and improvement of property for revenue-cutter purposes; not exceeding $10,000 for the improvement of the depot for the service at Arundel Cove, Md., purchased under authority of the act of March 3, 1905; contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, labor, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $1,600,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph. A surgeon is provided for, two civilian instructors, and not exceeding $10,000 for the improvement of the depot for service at Arundel Cove, Md. I think they are all subject to a point of order, but I would like to ask the gentleman what information the committee has upon this subject?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. At Arundel Cove is maintained a training school for this Service. Heretofore they have had no instructors except the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service. These officers have been detained there at inconvenience and detriment to the Service, and perhaps at times it has been found that they were not possessed of all the desirable qualifications for instructors, and it is the belief of the committee that the Revenue-Cutter Service ought to have at least two trained civilian instructors, selected with special reference to their ability as instructors rather than to their ability—as all commissioned officers necessarily are—in the work of the Revenue-Cutter Service. The showing made was such as to convince the committee that these civilian instructors ought to be allowed at this training school.

So far as the $10,000 is concerned, that is allowed for improvements. In the last Congress $30,000 was allowed for the purchase of the premises. They are in a bad state and need extensive repairs, and the committee believed that $10,000 was a moderate and reasonable allowance for the necessary improvements and repairs upon this property that has only recently come into the hands of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but this is not for repairs.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. For improvements.

Mr. MANN. They have not got $10,000 worth of buildings there to repair.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is for improvements.

Mr. MANN. I guess it is for new buildings.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is within the power to spend a portion of it for new buildings, but it was the belief of the committee from the testimony before it, which is shown in the hearings, that this amount was necessary to put this property that has recently been acquired by the United States into a suitable condition to carry on the training school.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that if the Service wishes to have improvements made there in the way of new buildings, it ought to go before the proper committee, which has jurisdiction of the matter. We have a bill pending before the committee now which has jurisdiction of the subject, not in reference to that particular matter, but in reference to some reorganization of the Service.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not prepared to say—but that question will not arise unless the gentleman deems it his duty to insist upon the point of order—that it is solely within the jurisdiction of his committee to authorize every improvement upon this property at Arundel Cove. Of course that question would come before the Chair on a point of order if made. But I trust the gentleman will not deem it his duty to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to make the point of order if the gentleman can tell us what it is for, and give a good reason for it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have stated that the record shows that within a year the property was purchased by the United States.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly familiar with that, for we passed the bill providing for the purchase.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The buildings are in bad repair, and more buildings are required. The sum is so modest, as compared with the munificent sums which Congress has appropriated to rebuild West Point and Annapolis, similar institutions for the Army and Navy, that the committee thought the amount ought to be allowed.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman means that this sum is to be used for repairs, I have no objection to it being appropriated for repairs of the buildings at that point, but it seems to me that Congress ought to have something before it to guide it in the building of new buildings. No one knows but that they may commence a hundred-thousand-dollar building. Congress absolutely has no control of the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think that is not justified, and I now have at hand the particular matter which I have referred to, and I will call it to the attention of the gentleman.

Last year the property was leased, and now it has been purchased outright.

In the estimate we have made we have put down $10,000 for the purpose of adding to some of the buildings, repairing wharves, and improving the property generally, and building an addition to the boiler house.

Now, this item was so small for these numerous purposes, of repairing wharves, building an addition to the boiler house, and some slight additional buildings needed, that the committee thought it was only a reasonable allowance, as compared with the millions that Congress has voted for the improvement of the Military and Naval Academy properties.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what a comparison has to do with it, but that explanation, so far as I am concerned, is satisfactory.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I believe now I have explained every item the gentleman speaks of except the item of the commissioned surgeon. He is authorized by express statute, and it is inserted here accordingly.

Mr. MANN. By what statute? It never has been provided for heretofore.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I call the gentleman's attention to the following, to be found on page 94 of the hearings:

Mr. SMITH. I notice you substitute the word "surgeon" for "surgeons" in this.

Captain ROSS. We have there a "surgeon," and then we have "surgeons" right after. Do you see that?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Captain ROSS. I will tell you how that came about. Congress passed a law some years ago giving us one surgeon. This man had made a trip to the Arctic for the relief of the whalers, and a bill was passed in Congress which made him a surgeon, with the rank of first lieutenant. He is in the service to-day as a commissioned officer. As soon as he dies the office lapses.

Mr. TAYLOR. You mean to say that the act made the surgeon by name?

Captain ROSS. Yes, sir; that is right——

Lieutenant REINBURG. For heroic services in Alaska.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I remember that now. I shall insist on the point of order, so far as it relates, on page 14, to the two civilian instructors—one at $1,800 and one at $1,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether there is any law authorizing this item?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would say that these two civilian instructors provided for in this bill were appropriated for on the urgent request and upon a showing that was made by the official in charge of the Revenue-Cutter Service, who appeared before the committee. There is no authorization in law for them. If the point of order is insisted upon, of course the point of order would have to be sustained. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois, however, that I think if he will read the testimony of the man in charge of the Revenue-Cutter Service, who appeared before the committee in respect to the necessity and advantage to the cadets of having two civilian instructors, he will be convinced, as the committee was convinced, of the advisability of providing for them.

Mr. MANN. That is quite possible. We have a bill pending before the committee that could easily cover this question as it covers a lot of other questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair understands that the point of order is not made to the entire paragraph.

Mr. MANN. No; just to that item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For special repairs to revenue cutters, $200,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee with regard to that paragraph and the following one. The following one is the provision authorizing the Navy Department to transfer the Bancroft from the Treasury Department for the Revenue-Cutter Service. My understanding is that it is the intention of the Department to use this vessel as a training ship. I know that it is in very bad repair, having had no repairs for a number of years, and it is estimated that $100,000 will be required to put it into serviceable condition. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if in the provision last read, appropriating $200,000, there is a provision for the repair of this vessel?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that for the first time the sundry civil bill carries an appropriation of $200,000 for repairs of the revenue-cutter vessels. In addition to that they have their usual appropriation and the general fund, which has been increased $150,000. Out of the $200,000, which they have never had before, they can use such amount as is necessary to put the Bancroft in proper condition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Toward the construction of a steam vessel specially fitted for and adapted to service at sea in bad weather, for the purpose of blowing up or otherwise destroying or towing into port wrecks, derelicts, and other floating dangers to navigation, said vessel to be operated and maintained by the Revenue-Cutter Service under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, as authorized by the act of Congress approved May 12, 1906, to be immediately available, $100,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for such construction at a cost not to exceed $250,000, the limit fixed by said act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, page 16. I think it is subject to the point of order, and I do it for the purpose of having a ruling. It has been the custom, and in this case that custom was followed, for an act to be passed authorizing in this case the Secretary of the Treasury—a special act—to have constructed at a cost not to exceed $250,000 the vessel referred to in this item of the appropriation bill. I think that gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make contracts. If it does, of course this item is unnecessary; if it does not, this item is subject to a point of order. It makes no difference to me, so far as this particular item is concerned, but if it is necessary to put this in the appropriation bill every time, then as far as I am concerned I want to see a form of the bill which we pass specially for these things changed, so that we cover the case. When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reports a bill into the House authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to construct one of these vessels or have it constructed, the intention is to give to that Secretary authority to have that vessel constructed, not to leave it exclusively to the Committee on Appropriations to afterwards decide the same question. I think the authority in the law now gives the Secretary the authority to do this. The light-house bill, which is now in conference, purports to give the Secretary of Commerce and Labor authority to construct various aids to navigation, but if this provision is necessary that bill might as well be thrown in the waste basket.

Mr. BARTLETT. Might I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think the committee ought to provide the amount necessary to build this vessel as reported and enacted into law by Congress?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think it is necessary to provide all the amount.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not say necessary; but does the gentleman not think we ought to provide the amount?

Mr. MANN. I do not think we ought to provide all at once. I do not know there is objection to appropriating part at one time and part at another time. Now, the distinction between this item and the previous item in the bill is this: Both relate to the construction of a vessel, but the previous item in the appropriation bill goes in under an act of Congress which does not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a vessel. "That there shall be constructed, for and under the supervision of the Revenue-Cutter Service, a first-class ocean-going tug." But the second item goes in under a provision which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed a vessel, at a cost not to exceed so much. Now, I contend to the gentleman in charge of the bill that is sufficient authority to construct the vessel. That is the form which has been adopted by our committee for the very purpose of leaving to the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction in reference to making the actual appropriation, but not leaving to the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction to determine whether a vessel can be constructed or not. When Congress authorizes the Secretary to construct a vessel, then it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to bring in appropriations necessary for the particular year. Congress has passed upon that question. It is bad form, and if it is persisted in will require us to reform our form, or that we make an appropriation for the vessel. I do not think the gentleman ought to resist it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not lawful for any administrative officer to involve the Government in any contract obligation without authority of law or in excess of appropriations made for that purpose. The bill authorizing the construction of this vessel made no appropriation whatever. While it authorizes the construction of the vessel it makes no appropriation for defraying the expense of that construction, and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury could not enter into any contract obligation for the building of the vessel until the appropriation was made for the purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TAWNEY. In just one moment. Now, the uniform practice has been to incorporate the language which is incorporated here in order to meet the condition, "and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for such construction, at a cost not to exceed $250,000," the limit of cost fixed by said act. Now, the appropriation is only $100,000, because that is all that can be expended during the next fiscal year in the construction of that vessel. The remainder of the appropriation or the limit of cost will be appropriated for or carried in the next sundry civil act, but this gives him authority to enter into a contract up to the full limit of cost. The result of the practice is to avoid appropriating money for objects for the next fiscal year, which money can not be expended during the fiscal year, but enabling the officer to create a contract liability to the full limit of cost. I do not see why the gentleman from Illinois finds any occasion to criticise this language or the practice. It is true that his committee reported a bill from this House authorizing the construction of this vessel. Congress passed it, and it has become a law. The Committee on Appropriations does not interfere with it. This language simply enables the Secretary to do that which he could not do under the terms of the bill as it passed both Houses of Congress, to make a contract to the full limit of cost, and also obviates the necessity of appropriating more money than can be expended for this object during the next fiscal year. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says this act did not appropriate any money. The act did authorize the construction of this vessel. Does not the gentleman think the practice of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in leaving to the Appropriations Committee the duty of appropriating money rather than the Interstate Commerce Committee itself should undertake to appropriate money, a proper custom and practice to be followed by that committee?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, certainly——

Mr. BARTLETT. We leave it to your committee, and I think we ought to do it. Now, the question I intended to ask the gentleman was, if there were hearings before the committee upon this particular item, if he believes a hundred thousand dollars is a sufficient amount to carry out the purposes of the act during the next fiscal year?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I will say to the gentleman that the Department advised us that they could not expend to exceed $100,000 during the fiscal year, and without this language the Department can not contract up to the limit of cost.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). Unless we appropriate the full amount.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that; but the information I want to get at, which the gentleman has almost entirely furnished, is that the idea of the Department is that this vessel can not be constructed during the next fiscal year entirely.

Mr. TAWNEY. It can not be; we are so advised by the Department.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wanted to get that information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the chairman of the committee this——

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply desire to say that if we appropriate now $250,000 for the construction of this vessel, that language is not necessary; but without the full appropriation, or appropriation for the maximum limit of cost, the Secretary of the Treasury can not contract for the completion of that vessel. Now, in order to enable him to contract for the completion of the vessel, we can——

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a fact that the Secretary can not so contract, because you have no authorization?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no authority to make any obligation; in fact, the law prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from making an obligation that is not authorized by law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to suggest, in connection with that, that the law prohibits any Department officer from making a contract beyond the appropriation for a public building or improvement. The decision of the House has been to the effect that boats and vessels are not public buildings or improvements, and that the limitation upon appropriation, if the authorization fixes the limit of cost, is a proper limitation upon the appropriation. The rule is applied to the building of the Navy, and my recollection is that it has likewise applied to the construction of boats for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks no holding of that kind has ever been made to apply to other than naval vessels.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the effect of sustaining the point of order would simply be this: That in order to commence the construction of this vessel, beginning the next fiscal year, we will then have to appropriate $250,000, the limit of cost, or $150,000 more than can be expended during the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may claim that that is an argument to the Chair that the point of order should not be sustained.

Mr. TAWNEY. The objection, or the point of order, if I understand, is to the language authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the whole limit of cost.

The CHAIRMAN. And for that authorization there must be legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. There must, and the authority for contracting and for the limit of cost for the full amount of the appropriation is all that this provision accomplishes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman in charge of the bill is correct, this is clearly subject to the point of order. If I am correct in my contention, it is not subject to the point of order. The gentleman, perhaps, had better direct his attention to me and see whether he can convince me or not.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not care whether it goes in or whether it stays out. I would just as soon see it go out, and then next year it can go in.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know, when the gentleman says that there is no authority, as a matter of fact whether the Secretary of the Treasury can not enter into a full contract before a cent is appropriated?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply a statute of the United States.

Mr. MANN. What is the statute? It is easy to say that there is a statute. I do not say that the gentleman is not correct. It is easy to say that there is a statute; but I do not know of any statute, I am frank to say. I do not see why authority given to an executive officer to do something, to construct a vessel, is not just as direct authority as to say that he can enter into a contract for the construction of a vessel. I fail to see the difference between directing an officer to do a thing and directing him to do it in a particular way. I would like to have the authority of law, if the gentleman has it.

Mr. TAWNEY (to Mr. CRUMPACKER). Has the gentleman the statute?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The section of the statute applies to public buildings and improvements. I do not believe it includes the construction of boats at all. A decision made by Speaker Reed, in the House of Representatives, twelve or fifteen years ago, perhaps the strongest among the decisions, held that it is a limitation, describing the manner in which the money is spent as the limitation by the rules of the House. There is no known statute which prevents this kind of a contract. The question is whether the authorization of the contract is legislation, or whether it is a limitation; that is the meaning in the practice of this House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me, and yield to a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana probably has referred to the law. I do not know the terms of the law he has in his mind. I should be glad if he would state what it is, as I have never known of any. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana that if Congress passes a law authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a Federal building at some town, that the Secretary of the Treasury gains no authority under that act of Congress, and that he can not proceed to construct the building?

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean that he can make a contract for a building, without express authority, where there has been no appropriation made?

Mr. MANN. The question is, If Congress passes a law authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to erect a public building at Hammond, Ind., can he do nothing in accordance with the law until after the Committee on Appropriations have made an appropriation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think that when Congress authorizes him to construct a public building, and gives him a certain amount, he is authorized to make a contract; but I do not see that a revenue cutter, a vessel, is a public building, or that it comes within the purview of that statute at all, and I think that when Congress——

Mr. MANN. Supposing it does not come within the purview of the statute. Here is an act which reads that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have constructed, at a cost not to exceed $250,000, a steam vessel, etc. Now, is it the contention of the Committee on Appropriations that that amounts to nothing, that that does not give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to have a vessel constructed?

Mr. TAWNEY. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois I will say——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has the floor.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me quote this statute. The act authorizing the construction of this vessel does not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into any contract obligation involving the Government in the payment of the money necessary for that construction. Now, section 3679 of the Revised Statutes reads as as follows:

> No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the deficiency statute—to prevent deficiencies.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think that is clearly——

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not the deficiency statute at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a special statute on the subject of contracts.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the act passed July 12, 1870.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit me, under that statute, if you follow the wording of it, the Secretary of the Treasury could not enter into a contract. Now, it is nonsense to say that we can not authorize him——

Mr. TAWNEY. He can not enter into a contract without this authority.

Mr. MANN. But that statute would forbid giving him the authority. I say we give him the authority when we authorize him to construct the vessel.

Mr. TAWNEY. You did not give it to him expressly to enter into a contract. He can build it in any old way he pleases.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing there forbidding him to enter into a contract.

Mr. TAWNEY. It says he can not involve the Government of the United States in any contract obligation——

Mr. MANN. Beyond the appropriation; but if we pass a statute authorizing him to do it, that takes the place of the former statute. We do that in all our public building acts.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We do not in a single one.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am advised it has never been done in a single instance, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I will give the gentleman a little further information. There have been no instances of recent years, except these instances now, where we have adopted the form that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has here adopted. In these two items one of the forms that was passed did not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to construct the vessel. The other did authorize him, and what I am contending for is that the form which we have adopted does authorize him; and if it is decided that it does not, I want to know it, and we will change the form.

Mr. TAWNEY. Another section of the statute, section 3732, reads as follows:

No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made, unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is the law, how do you expect to change it on an appropriation bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. We do not propose to change it. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] whether under his contention he thinks it would be advisable and that the Committee on Appropriations should, in the face of the fact given us by the Treasury Department that they can expend no more than $100,000 in the construction of this vessel next year, or the next fiscal year, have reported here an appropriation of $250,000 for that purpose in order to enable the Secretary to make a contract for the completion of that vessel?

Mr. MANN. I have no criticism whatever to make on the Committee on Appropriations in this matter. I think the Committee on Appropriations did precisely the thing I should have done if I had been in their place and had good intelligence; but the question goes beyond that. What we want to know is what the law is in reference to these matters. The Committee on Appropriations reported in accordance with what was its judgment of the law. If that judgment be correct, their action is correct. I wish, however, the gentleman would pass this item until we ascertain what the Comptroller says. If the Comptroller says that this contract can not be entered into, I have no objection to the item.

Mr. TAWNEY. I should like very much to accommodate the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether the gentleman accommodates me or not. I am perfectly willing to have a ruling.

Mr. TAWNEY. This has been the practice of the House.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman it is no accommodation to me.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been the practice of the House in reference to all the vessels of the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Life-Saving Service, authority for the construction of which has been given by reports from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and if the gentleman wants to put the House in the position of being compelled to appropriate $150,000 more for this purpose than is necessary he can do so, and the point of order can be sustained or overruled at this time.

Mr. MANN. I will say, if the Chair will permit me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the paragraph is obnoxious to the rule, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. I just wish to say to the gentleman that yesterday when the gentleman from Minnesota asked me to consent to pass over an item I very gladly did it, although I had the gentleman in what seemed to be a very tight place. This time the gentleman does not wish to pass it over. It makes no difference to me. I shall be perfectly willing to accommodate the gentleman at all times.

Mr. TAWNEY. "The gentleman from Minnesota" asked that that item be passed in order that he might obtain information concerning it. The gentleman from Illinois is so well informed on this subject that he did not ask that it go over for the purpose of his gaining any information, but in order that I might be informed, and be convinced, possibly.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. I should much rather be convinced that the view of the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the Chair has sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to amend the section by striking out "one hundred thousand dollars" and inserting "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars." That was the amount authorized by this act which it is proposed to carry out. The vessel is of a great deal of importance to commerce.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I understood from the ruling of the Chair that the entire section goes out.

The CHAIRMAN. The point was only made as to the last four lines.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my friend from Georgia that there is no possible doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury can go ahead and make a contract for this vessel; and if he can not, we will correct it.

Mr. BARTLETT. He can go ahead and make the contract, but how is he going to pay for it?

Mr. MANN. He can use only $100,000 in the next fiscal year.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman understands that I have no purpose except to carry out the law that is reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. I raised the point, I will say to the gentleman, more on account of the light-house matter than anything else. I want to know "where we are at."

Mr. BARTLETT. Why not permit the amendment to be made at $250,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will not consent to that, in view of the fact that the Treasury Department says that it can not spend but $100,000 this year. I shall not consent to give them $150,000 they do not want and can not expend.

Mr. BARTLETT. Would the Secretary of the Treasury under this authorization simply undertake to provide for a boat costing $100,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; he will contract for a boat, as the gentleman from Illinois contends, contract for a vessel up to the limit of the cost, and $100,000 will enable him to go on and build, and at another session of Congress we can give him the remaining amount.

Mr. BARTLETT. I offer an amendment making it $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, page 16, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I have no desire to change the bill or to make this for any amount except that provided for by law, nor do I desire to make the amount larger in this appropriation bill than can be used by the Department. I offer this amendment out of pure caution that no complication might arise in the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury that he would not be authorized to contract for a boat or vessel of the size of that authorized by the act.

Now, if it is the opinion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the Secretary of the Treasury will provide or contract for a vessel which would eventually cost $250,000 and expend only $100,000 during the next fiscal year, I am content. But having looked into the matter of the necessity for the vessel, I am very anxious that it should be built, and built of the size and dimensions provided for, and expected to be built for $250,000. Will the gentleman from Minnesota answer my question whether or not, if the provision remains in the bill at $100,000, the Secretary of the Treasury will contract for a vessel only to cost $100,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Georgia will pardon me, but the contention of the gentleman from Illinois and myself is to the effect—the gentleman from Illinois contends that he now has authority——

Mr. BARTLETT. But the Chair has ruled differently.

Mr. TAWNEY. The ruling of the Chair does not affect the contention of the gentleman from Illinois. My contention is that without this it would be impossible for him to make the contract.

Mr. BARTLETT. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. The question is, Whose opinion is entitled to the most weight? I am rather inclined to think, from what I know about the gentleman from Illinois and from my confidence in my own opinion, that the most weight should be given to his opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Both opinions are entitled to much weight; but the gentleman from Minnesota is in charge of the bill, and we have to look to him for information about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that it is my information and my judgment, from an examination of the statutes, that the Secretary of the Treasury can not contract for a vessel to the maximum limit of cost unless the full amount is appropriated for; but I do not believe at this time that this amendment should prevail. We ought to conclude the consideration of this bill, and then the matter may be cleared up and fully ascertained. I do not want to put in the bill $150,000 that we will have to reappropriate in the next Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman knows that I do not want to do so, and that is not my purpose. Simply because the gentleman took the position he has just reiterated and out of pure caution is the reason I offer the amendment. Now, will the gentleman from Minnesota agree that this may be passed without prejudice?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the appropriation had better stand as it is at $100,000, which is the amount that will be expended, and when the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia and myself call upon the Comptroller of the Treasury and ascertain what his ruling would be, we can perhaps return to this item and fix it up by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he will agree to that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I ask that it be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the section be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

International Catalogue of Scientific Literature: For the cooperation of the United States in the work of the International Catalogue of Scientific Literature, including the preparation of a classified index catalogue of American scientific publications for incorporation in the International Catalogue, the expense of clerk hire, the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, and other necessary incidental expenses, $5,000, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to the paragraph just read, with a view of finding out something about it. I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of this bill what it means.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will suggest to the gentleman that he direct his inquiries to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, for many years there has been an international society of nations, as distinguished from a society of individuals from those nations, engaged in the preparation of a catalogue, international in character, of scientific works. The expense here covered is simply the expense incident to the compilation of a catalogue of the American scientific works to be furnished to the international society, to be incorporated in the international catalogue. The United States has not heretofore appropriated for this specific purpose, but the expense has heretofore been borne chiefly from the funds of the Smithsonian Institution. The whole revenues of the Smithsonian Institution derived from the trust fund are only about $50,000 per annum. The preparation of this American portion of this international scientific work therefore consumes about 10 per cent of all the revenues of the Smithsonian Institution. This is, in my judgment, a diversion of that trust fund from the purposes for which it was given. I think it is such a use of it as ought not to be permitted. The trustees of the Smithsonian Institution are unwilling longer to devote this great portion of their revenues from this trust fund to the preparation of the American material for insertion in the international catalogue. It is essential to scientific study that the scientific works of the world should be annually catalogued, and it seems but a small contribution for the United States to make, to be willing to pay the simple expense of cataloguing the American scientific works and furnishing that portion of the matter to be incorporated in the great work.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is it not true that all of the great libraries of the world are catalogued up to date, and contain all of the publications, scientific and otherwise?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not true that the great libraries of the world are able to keep up each year with all the scientific works in all the languages that men speak. This is for the great libraries.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Each library has its own catalogue—current catalogue—has it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, it does in a way have a catalogue; but it is never possible for these different libraries to prepare a complete catalogue of all the scientific works of the world for that year, and that must be plain to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] when I tell him that the work incident to the preparation of the catalogue of the American scientific works alone costs $5,000, and that many of the nations of the earth are contributing much more in scientific literature than we are and to the preparation of this catalogue than we are asked to contribute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are not these same publications catalogued by the Congressional Library?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is probable that the Library of Congress catalogues these publications in a measure. It is not conceivable that it is capable of cataloguing all the scientific works published in every country in the world every year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course, but this appropriation is only for the cataloguing of the American scientific publications, and I had the impression that the Library of Congress already made a complete and current catalogue of all publications.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not being furnished in form for use by the international society.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why don't he furnish catalogues of scientific works?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not advised why it is not furnished, but this is the source—the Smithsonian—from which the international society has always derived this contribution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no law authorizing this expenditure now, is there?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is not. The United States has long participated, but participated through the Smithsonian trust fund, and the trustees are unwilling to longer pay the expense.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That, the gentleman says, is a diversion of a trust fund. Congress has never made any provision for this?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to insist on the point of order, if it is good, and I think it is. There is no authority in law for this appropriation; it is conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana make the point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I grant the point of order is well taken. I regret the gentleman from Indiana feels constrained to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is conceded by the gentleman to be well taken, and is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building for National Museum: For continuing the construction of the building for the National Museum, and for each and every purpose connected with the same, $500,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to briefly make a few observations, not so much on the merits of the item, as on the general proposition of the cost of our public buildings. I want to seriously, candidly, and frankly call to the attention of the distinguished chairman, whom I know is industrious and has shown that he is a man of intelligence, as are his associates, Why is it, gentlemen—I am sure you have asked yourself, as I have myself—that we have so many deficiencies? We appropriate here, and fix the cost, to build things, and then we have to appropriate a whole lot more to finish them. I am going to read briefly a few lines from Secretary Taft on the proposition of the home and foreign cost of structural material.

In a letter to the President, dated May 14, 1906, Secretary Taft, in part, says on buying two steel dredges for the Panama Canal:

When the Army went to the Philippines, which were not affected by the Dingley tariff and where Army supplies were admited free of duty, the question arose as to where Army supplies were to be purchased. The practice was adopted under this section to buy supplies for the Army in the Philippines where they could be had at the cheapest price, preference of course being given to American supplies and material when conditions of price and quality were equal. Accordingly, large amounts of meat have been purchased from Australia instead of from the United States, because meat could be purchased at about one-half what it would cost to bring it over from the Pacific coast.

The result of a consideration of general principles of law and the practice of the Government, in the absence of specific direction to the contrary, is that in the construction of the Panama Canal in the Canal Zone on the Isthmus, which is outside the tariff wall surrounding the United States proper, and into which, by virtue of the Hay-Varilla treaty with the Republic of Panama, material, supplies, and machinery of all kinds for the construction of the canal are to be introduced free from tariff or imposts, it is your duty to buy where you can obtain the material, supplies, and machinery at the cheapest price, other conditions with respect to quality, prompt delivery, etc., being equal. This view, it seems to me, is confirmed by the failure of Congress to direct any different course on your part, although the matter was brought to its attention more than a year ago, and your view of your duty in the premises, if Congress took no further action, was clearly indicated.

I ought to add that, while of course a very large proportion of all the purchases made for the construction of the canal have been from American merchants and manufacturers, some purchases have already been made abroad, and a saving effected in the purchase of comparatively small quantities of cement. In the construction of the canal an enormous quantity of cement will have to be purchased, and the question will soon recur again as to the acceptance of foreign bids for this material.

Very respectfully, WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT.

Now, I am not going to talk politics. I am going to talk dollars and cents reform for the benefit of the Government and people. You will remember two or three years ago Mr. Secretary of the Navy Moody reported to Congress that he would not start the work on the Annapolis buildings until we gave (in addition to the $8,000,000 already appropriated) $2,000,000 more, and he said the reason why he did that was because structural material had gone up either 20 or 30 per cent; that the architect had so reported. Congress gave the $2,000,000 additional and finished paying it a few days ago, I believe. I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 444 of the present Congress. In Secretary Taft's letter to the War Department, dated War Department, May 14, 1906, wherein bids for a couple of dredges for canal work were discussed, he states there is a difference of $70,850 between a Scotch bid and an American bid—between a bid made by the Maryland Steel Company, with headquarters at Sparrows Point, Md., and the Scotch firm of William Simons & Co., of Renfrew, Scotland. Now, gentlemen, here is the point of my proposition: In that small matter, less than $700,000, here is a saving of seventy-odd thousand dollars to the United States Treasury when we permit foreign structural builders to bid on our contract.

Now, here is an appropriation bill which, I believe, carries nearly a hundred million dollars—between ninety and a hundred million—and in a short while there will be, or rather exists now, deficiencies, and you will find, gentlemen, that in a great measure these deficiencies are brought about by the trusts and combinations dealing in all kinds of building material in this country, who have put up the price of material, and thus the original appropriation becomes too small to pay for the work. After we set a price on what a thing shall cost, after the plans are made, after they are submitted, and after we start on the work, we find that Government and the American people are in the grasp of the structural material makers of this country, who have practically no competitors. We find in a small matter—less than $700,000—this Panama proposition, there is a saving to the Government due to foreign bids of nearly $71,000 by allowing foreign bids. In the Annapolis instance they raised the cost of building material nearly 30 per cent.

Now, these are facts, gentlemen, which nobody can dispute. And I say here, in all candor, gentlemen of the Republican party—now, I must speak of partyism right here—you owe it to the American people to see not only that the laws are amended to meet the conditions and exigencies such as I have suggested here, but you owe it to the people to so change the laws as to prevent such a condition of things as this to arise and attack the Treasury. It is your duty to protect the American Treasury against being held up by these people, I do not care where or who they are. Why, they are indicting trusts in my country, and if guilty, whether black or white, Republican or Democrat, and more so if he is a Democrat, because he ought to know better, let them be indicted and punished.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman can not get the floor by offering another amendment for an additional five minutes. He must get additional time——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to suggest to the gentleman that this is the first time I have ever heard that objection made. Now, I have known the gentleman himself to make the same request. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I may not take it all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a matter that Judge Taft, a man of brains, integrity, and backbone, has brought to your attention, yet you stand here, "standing pat," so pat that you dare not put the "monopolized article" upon the free list, as the old leaders of your party did to free the monopolized article, and you do not even dare to reduce the tariff and allow fair competition in the limits of the United States proper. Now even the fact that here you have one of your own great men—a man almost greater, if a man can be, than his party, Secretary Taft—bringing to your attention this matter, does not seem to move you from your "stand-pat" status. I believe the Senate has already passed a resolution preventing the Secretary of War or the President of the United States from even saving this $70,000 to the Government of the United States in this Panama matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the time of the committee further, but I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject of export and home price of our American manufactures.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee is as follows:

Home and foreign price of American-made goods.

[By Byrum W. Holt, secretary New York Tariff Reform Club.]

EXPORT PRICES.

An attempt will be made in this pamphlet to show—

1. That it is reasonably certain that the great bulk of our exports of manufactured goods, amounting to $452,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1904, are sold to foreigners at prices much lower than those prevailing in this country.

2. That it is highly improbable that these exported goods are sold at a loss.

3. That a regular system of continuously selling exported goods at prices below those exacted in the home market prevails in the United States and other high-tariff countries.

4. That while most protectionist countries encourage the selling of manufactured goods to foreigners at lower than home prices by the payment of drawback duties on imported material used in the manufactured article, and sometimes by direct export bounties, yet—

5. That, in this country at least, neither drawback duties nor export bounties account for much of this foreign selling at reduced prices.

6. That therefore these export prices furnish evidence that our present tariff duties are unnecessarily high, even from a protectionist standpoint.

7. That combinations, or trusts, controlling the home market take advantage of this excessive protection to exact exorbitant prices from domestic consumers.

8. That not only is this an oppression upon our citizens, who have generously taxed themselves for the benefit of these favored industries, but—

9. That it seriously handicaps all unprotected exporters, whether manufacturers or farmers, because it compels them to pay higher prices for materials, machinery, and supplies than are paid by their foreign competitors.

10. That, instead of encouraging our home industries, protection, by making it cheaper to produce abroad, is now encouraging foreign industry.

11. That for these reasons many important manufacturing establishments founded and conducted with American capital have recently been located abroad rather than in the United States.

I. OUR EXPORTS OF MANUFACTURED GOODS.

For the year ending June 30, 1904, our exports of manufactured goods were valued at $452,000,000. These goods comprised nearly all kinds and classes of manufactured articles. The more important items, according to value, were:

Exports of domestic manufacture for the year ending June 30, 1904.

Iron and steel	$111,948,586
Mineral oil, refined	72,487,415
Copper, manufactures of	57,142,079
Leather, and manufactures of	33,980,615
Agricultural implements	22,749,635
Cotton, manufactures of	22,403,713
Chemicals, drugs, dyes, and medicines (about)	13,000,000
Wood, manufactures of (not lumber)	12,981,112
Paraffin and paraffin wax	8,859,964
Instruments and apparatus, scientific	8,297,723
Paper, and manufactures of	7,543,728
Fibers, manufactures of	6,414,638
Tobacco, manufactures of	5,042,719
India rubber, etc., manufactures of	4,435,590
Books, maps, and other printed matter	4,347,304
Cars, passenger and freight, etc	3,370,736
Carriages, all other	3,354,801
Musical instruments	3,230,982
Paints, pigments, and colors	2,756,581

Automobiles, and parts of	1,895,605
Lamps, chandeliers, etc	1,502,888
Jewelry and manufactures of gold and silver	1,365,654
Starch	1,340,282

NEARLY ALL GOODS SOLD CHEAPER FOR EXPORT.

The evidence is overwhelming that the great bulk of these exported goods are sold at prices materially lower than those prevailing in the United States. Those who have been connected with the export trade for many years estimate that 85 or 90 per cent of our exports are sold at an average of about 20 per cent less than they would have brought if sold at home-market prices.

On many important articles the difference between the export and home prices is above 50 per cent—often 100 per cent. The average difference for iron and steel goods is about 30 per cent. The average difference for mineral oil, implements, tools, and machinery is about 20 per cent; for leather goods and furniture, about 10 per cent, and for manufactures of cotton and copper, cars, carriages, and paints, somewhat less than 10 per cent.

TARIFF REFORM COMMITTEE'S PAMPHLET OF 1890.

Perhaps the first important evidence that, as a result of our highly protective tariff, American manufacturers were continuously selling manufactured goods abroad on an extensive scale at prices much below those prevailing in the United States was presented by the Tariff Reform Committee when it, on August 30, 1890, published Protection's Home Market, a 16-page illustrated pamphlet containing statements from leading manufacturers, from prominent Republicans, and from export journals, which published the export prices of many articles. This pamphlet was widely circulated, and undoubtedly helped to produce the political turnover of 1890 and 1892.

A few statements from this pamphlet may be quoted here, not only because they are valuable in themselves, but because they portray conditions to-day almost as well as they did fourteen years ago.

The American Machinist, September 26, 1889, said:

"Just why American manufacturers will sell machinery and other goods from 10 to 30 per cent cheaper in Europe than they will sell them to be used at home is rather puzzling; but anyone curious in the matter can easily enough find out that many of them do this. It may be necessary to cut prices in order to secure trade from abroad, but it is likely to strike the American purchaser as being a little rough on him."

The Engineering and Mining Journal, March 15, 1890, said:

"So soon as the industry has attained the position where it can more than supply our home market and has to send its goods abroad, where they compete with those of foreign manufacturers, it is evident that they are either giving the foreigners the benefit of lower rates than they do onur own people or that they are able to get along at home without any protection from foreign manufactures. It is not fair that our own people should be made to pay more than foreigners for the products of our own land."

The Republican Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jeremiah M. Rusk, gave some expert testimony on this subject in 1890. He said:

"I had an opportunity to take some stock in the combination (American Harvester Company), and I know what inducements were offered. An investigation will show that this same combination is now selling or offering to sell machinery in Russia and Australia and other wheat-growing countries at a lower figure than they do in this country. This won't do, and I need not offer any argument to prove the weight or truth of the assertion. The first thing the farmer will do when he is acquainted with the facts will be to make a howl against the trusts and protection that does not protect. Whether justly or not, he will charge it to the Republican party. I am as certain as I can be of anything that this mower and reaper trust will cost the Republican party hundreds of thousands of votes at the next Presidential election unless it takes a firm stand against it and trusts in general."

Even that steadfast Republican paper, the New York Press, admitted on October 22, 1889, that—

"It is sometimes looked upon as wise to ship goods out of the country at cost, rather than break the regular price for which such articles sell in the country in which they are produced."

On July 30, 1890, Mr. A. B. Farquhar, in a letter to the Farmers' Call, of Quincy, Ill., said:

"Certainly our manufactures are sold much lower abroad; we could only need protection to get better prices from our customers at home. We do manufacture and sell in Canada, South America, and Europe many agricultural implements and machines, and could we have free raw material and the commercial advantages which free trade would give us America would become the great manufacturing emporium of the world, and the farmer, of course, would share the prosperity, since he would have less to pay for everything and get better prices for all he sold. Go on with your good work. When the farmer begins to think and rise up against this swindle it is doomed."

As to whether or not the export prices quoted were for the wholesale trade alone, the Engineering and Mining Journal of August 26, 1890, said:

"Prices quoted by us are, as you will notice, at the head of the first column, 'for export only,' and the prices therein given are the prices at which every foreign subscriber can buy in this market. It stands to reason that orders for farm implements are frequently for one only. If to buy one machine is retail trade, then these foreign prices are retail prices.

"Our domestic subscribers are barred from the prices quoted in these columns. These special discounts are 'for export only,' and in more than one instance we have lost our advertiser through publishing these prices.

"That the foreigner can buy at retail in this market cheaper than the domestic consumer is as indisputable as the daily revolution of the earth. We can enumerate any number of instances where houses have written us: 'Prices furnished are for export only, and it would be most injurious to us if these figures were circulated in the "home markets."'"

From several export price lists and from prices obtained direct from manufacturers, this Reform Club pamphlet of 1890 compared the domestic and foreign prices of many articles. It appeared that agricultural implements, machinery, and tools were sold for export at prices from 5 to 40 per cent below those charged in the home market. Barb wire was then sold for export at $2, and at home at $3 per hundred pounds; wire nails at $1.35 and $2.25, respectively; rivets at $5.55 and $10; typewriters at $60 abroad and $100 at home; sewing machines at $20.75 abroad and $27.50 at home.

PRACTICE HAS GROWN WITH OUR EXPORT TRADE.

Since 1890 the practice of selling goods at lower prices for export has grown with our export trade in manufactured products. During this period commercial and daily newspapers have been continually printing letters and news items about the differences between the home and export prices of various articles and goods, and sometimes of American goods reimported, after paying transportation costs both ways, and sold at a profit under the home-market prices.

In 1902 the Democratic campaign book contained considerable evidence on this subject. This year's Democratic campaign book contains much more evidence, and enumerates hundreds of articles on which the differences between the export and home prices is very marked. Nearly all of the prices in the campaign book are quoted in this pamphlet, full information as to their accuracy having been obtained.

II. OFFICIAL EVIDENCE.

ADMISSIONS FROM GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS IN 1900.

By 1900 the numerous iron and steel combinations (not yet consolidated) had become so dictatorial at home and so bold in selling their products abroad at greatly reduced prices that it became necessary to convey to them an official warning of the folly of the course they were pursuing.

The following quotations are from a special article on iron and steel in the official Report of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Finance for August, 1900:

"The progress of work on shipbuilding in the United States has likewise been retarded, because makers of steel materials required a higher price from the American consumers than they did from the foreign consumers for substantially similar products. Of course American exporters have to get foreign contracts in competition with foreign plate makers, who are excluded from our domestic market. In addition to this, American export plate makers are interested in preventing the establishment of plate manufacturing in their customer nations abroad, and to that end bid low enough to discourage foreign nations from entering the field for producing their own plate at home. The progress of domestic manufactures of iron and steel goods may likewise be handicapped by the sale of iron and steel in their manufactured state at so much lower a price to foreigners than to domestic customers as to keep the American competitor out of foreign markets generally. The natural limit to such a policy of maintaining a higher level of prices for these materials at home than abroad is found in the restriction of domestic consumption and the import duty. If restriction of consumption at home does not operate to prevent the shortsighted policy of discrimination against domestic development of manufacturing industries, the other contingency is more or less sure to rise, namely, the demand for the reduction of the tariff on unfinished iron and steel, in order to equalize the opportunity of makers of finished products in foreign markets. To this policy the domestic consumer is usually ready to lend himself, thus making a powerful combination of interests to set limits to the rise of domestic prices on iron and steel materials.

* * * * * * *

"Of the two policies open to iron and steel makers, the farsighted one of keeping the domestic and foreign markets as near as possible on a par in the price of these materials of manufacture seems by far the wiser one to follow, both in the interest of a steadier course of prices, which means steadier consumption, and on account of the competition of manufacturers of finished goods with foreign manufacturers in the neutral markets of the world.

"The other policy of maintaining prices to manufacturers at the highest level at home leaves little margin for experiment in seeking new markets, and restricts the application of iron and steel to additional uses at home. The depressing effects of an agitation for tariff revision to remedy this inequality are sure to cause a far greater business loss not only to the country as a whole, but to the producers of iron and steel themselves than is to be gained by selling at low prices abroad, which they can not help, and at high prices at home, which they can help. Nor can the home-market price be sustained beyond certain limits by export sales. Certain American manufacturers of steel materials tried this policy up to April, 1900. It resulted in a very positive shrinkage in domestic consumption at the then high rates. Farmers had ceased to purchase barbed wire for wire fences, retail hardware dealers had complained for months of diminished business in nails and wire. Jobbers had gotten in the way of doing a hand-to-mouth business on prices that had advanced from $1.35 to $3.20 in the course of a year. Hence the reduction of $1 in April, 1900, became a necessity in order to keep the mills in operation.

"If steel rails, for example, sell at Pittsburg for $35 per ton for months in succession for home consumption, while the foreign consumer is purchasing them for $22 to $24 per ton, the domestic market is sure to order no more than it is obliged to have for the time being."

This warning to the iron and steel companies was unheeded. They immediately formed a much bigger trust (the United States Steel Corporation) and became more domineering than ever at home while pushing boastfully and ostentatiously into foreign markets by offering goods for exports at prices sometimes less than half those charged in the United States. Apparently the Republicans themselves have forgotten their own warnings. Or, perhaps, having been victorious in the elections of 1900 and seeing no very unusual demonstrations on the part of the people, they have concluded that there is no limit to the endurance and meekness of the voters, and it is safe to "stand pat" on a tariff that encourages these outrageous practices.

EVERYTHING LOWER FOR EXPORT, SAID PRESIDENT SCHWAB, OF THE STEEL TRUST.

The president of the United States Steel Corporation testified before the Industrial Commission on May 11, 1901. He had grown up in steel mills and had always seen all kinds of steel goods sold at reduced prices for export. Apparently it had never occurred to him that this system was an abuse of protection, was against public policy, and that everybody did not know of this usual and habitual difference between export and home prices. Hence he made some very frank admissions. Here are some extracts from his testimony:

"Q. Will you take up the question for a moment of the relation between export prices and the prices in this country? You have, perhaps, heard some of the discussion.—A. I heard some of the discussion of the gentleman who just preceded me. I do not quite agree with him, of course. It is quite true, as he says, that export prices are made at a very much lower rate than those here, but there is no one who has been a manufacturer for any length of time who will not tell you that the reason he sold, even at a loss, was to run his works full and steady. That has been the chief thing regarding all these companies in their export business. I think you may safely say this, that where large export business is done, for example, in the line of iron and steel, nearly all the people from whom supplies are bought for that purpose give you a good price for the materials that go into export. Railroads will in most instances carry them a little cheaper for you, and so on all down the line. But labor, within my knowledge at least, has never been asked to work for a lower price for export material, so that labor benefits more by it than almost any other interest.*

"Q. Is it a fact generally true of all exporters in this country that they do sell at lower prices in foreign markets than they do in the

* The fallacy in this statement is exposed by a notorious illustration. It was not very long after this testimony was given that the tin-plate branch of the United States Steel Corporation coerced its workmen into an agreement to accept about 20 per cent lower wages upon tin plate made for export. The company asserted that it was only by such a reduction of wages that it could obtain orders from the Standard Oil Company. Heretofore that company has used imported tin plate from which to make the cans for exported oil, obtaining a drawback from the Government of 99 per cent of the duty paid on the imported plate. (See pp. 16–17, infra.)

home market?—A. That is true; perfectly true. I just want to interrupt you and say that American steel has been sold in the American market at as low prices in times of extreme depression as it has been in foreign markets, but it has been sold without profit. You know we do run for a space of time at a loss.

"Q. Would you say that when business is in a normal condition the export prices are regularly somewhat lower than home prices?—A. Oh, yes; always.

"Q. (By Mr. Jenks.) I should like to go back a moment to the question of export prices. You said that during last year the export price was considerably lower than the price in the United States. Would you mind giving us definite figures?—A. I have not them at hand, but it would vary with each article.

"Q. Suppose you take the case of steel rails. Could you give us about the difference between the export and domestic price?—A. I would have to make a guess; I do not know definitely. The export price was about $23 a ton.

"Q. And the price here?—A. Was $26 and $28.

"Q. At the same time?—A. At the same time.

"Q. In making these export prices are the export prices at all uniform or do they vary?—A. They vary with the competition we may have."

Mr. John W. Gates, the head of the American Steel and Wire Company, told the Industrial Commission on November 14, 1899, that barb wire and wire goods were sold cheaper to foreigners because lower prices were necessary in order "to hold outside trade." He said they were exporting 700 tons of wire a day and that they furnished England with 60 per cent of her supply of wire.

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION'S INVESTIGATION OF EXPORT PRICES.

The Industrial Commission, a strongly partisan body, made an investigation of export prices. It sent schedules of inquiry to 2,000 of the 600,000 manufacturing establishments in this country. It received 416 replies. In these replies 75 manufacturers admitted that they were discriminating in favor of foreign customers, and that their exports were valued at about $4,000,000.

On the supposition that these 75 manufacturers were the only ones in this entire country who were selling goods for export at reduced prices, many leading Republicans are asserting that out of our total product of manufactured goods, valued at over $13,000,000,000, and of our total exports of manufactured goods, valued at over $450,000,000, only $4,000,000 worth of goods are sold abroad at reduced prices. Absurd as they are, these statements are repeated in many forms in the Republican campaign book of this year and in the speeches of Secretary Shaw, Speaker CANNON, and others. Secretary Shaw's favorite way of stating it is that only "one-thirteenth of 1 per cent of the output of our factories is annually sold abroad cheaper than in the domestic markets."

That the investigation of this subject made by the Industrial Commission was most inadequate is evident to all who know how it was conducted, and is, indeed, substantially admitted by the Commission in their report.

Replies were received from only about one out of every five manufacturing establishments to which schedules of inquiry were sent. As it was optional with the manufacturers whether or not they should fill out and return the inquiry blanks, it may be presumed that the really guilty ones did not volunteer information which would endanger their protection. Many manufacturers made ridiculous answers, perhaps with a view to providing campaign material for the party of protection.

Thus many asserted that their domestic prices were substantially below their export prices. This is absurd. Not only is there no reason why export should exceed domestic prices, but it is next to impossible for them to do so. As 90 or 95 per cent of all goods exported are sold through export commission houses, which buy of manufacturers and sell to foreign customers, it is absurd to suppose that they will pay manufacturers much more for goods than these goods are selling for in the domestic market. The exporters would, of course, fill their foreign orders by buying goods where they could obtain them cheapest. Hence it is impossible for the export to exceed the domestic prices under similar conditions of sale. Under these circumstances it is remarkable that even seventy-five manufacturers frankly admitted that they were selling goods cheaper to foreigners than to Americans.

VALUABLE EVIDENCE FOR COMMISSION'S REPORT.

In spite of the unfavorable conditions under which the Industrial Commission's investigation was made, considerable valuable information was obtained from the admissions of the seventy-five manufacturers and from the conclusions of the Commission. In summing up their conclusions as to export prices the Industrial Commission said:

"In about 20 per cent of the cases covered by the Commission's returns the export prices have ruled lower than those charged to home consumers. * * * The practice is quite common in all countries and on the part of separate establishments as well as of combinations."

In view of "the practice by some exporters of making lower prices abroad than at home, and of the desirability of protecting the consumer as well as the producer," the Commission recommend that, "without waiting other legislation, the Congress provide for a commission to investigate and study the subject and to report as soon as possible what concessions in duties may be made without endangering wages or employment at home, what advantages abroad may be obtained therefrom, and also to suggest measures best suited to gain the ends desired."

This is a substantial admission that the investigation was not thorough and that tariff duties were, in part, at least, responsible for the difference between export and home prices. No attention whatever was paid to this recommendation by Congress.

REPORT OF MR. THOMAS W. PHILLIPS, A MEMBER OF THE COMMISSION.

One of the Commission, Mr. Thomas W. Phillips, did not sign the majority report. In a suplementary statement he said:

"There are a large number of industries in which it is in evidence that the domestic price is much higher than the export price. I do not agree that the answers to inquiries addressed by the Commission to exporters indicate that the trusts are not chargeable with this practice to any serious extent. Out of the 2,000 schedules of inquiries sent out there were received only 416 replies, and only a very few of these replies came from corporations known popularly as trusts (Vol. XIII, p. 726). The fact that about seventy-five answers indicated lower prices abroad than at home is significant when it is noted that more than four-fifths of those addressed failed to answer, and that naturally those who are chargeable with such discrimination would be the ones who would decline to reply.

"Several witnesses before the Commission on behalf of the trusts admitted that their export prices were lower than the domestic prices, but they contended that this was necessary in order to work off their surplus and to keep their establishments running full time, and that all manufacturers in all countries do the same. This argument overlooks the fact that their surplus products could also be worked off by lower prices at home and that it is the tariff which encourages them to cause domestic surplus by restricting domestic consumption through high prices."

On April 2, 1902, Mr. John M. Peters testified before the Ways and Means Committee that lead was being exported and sold for but little more than half of the home price. On the same day Mr. A. G. Webster, president of the New England Shoe Association, testified that leather was sold for export at 5 to 10 per cent below domestic prices.

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SHIPPING COMMISSION.

Some evidence as to export prices was obtained in the testimony given before the Congressional Merchant Marine Commission at its sittings in different cities this year.

Mr. James J. Hill, of the Great Northern Railroad, stated that competing roads in Canada were obtaining American rails at $10 a ton less than he had to pay for them, and since that testimony was given the trade papers have reported heavy sales by the United States Steel Corporation to the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company, at $20 per ton—$8 lower than the lowest domestic price.

Mr. James C. Wallace, of the American Shipbuilding Company, on June 28, 1904, at Cleveland, Ohio, told this Commission that American steel was delivered at Belfast for $24 a ton, while the same steel cost purchasers in this country $32* at Pittsburg. In reply to members of the Commission he stated that his authority for the statement came from the assistant sales agent of the Carnegie Steel Company. This statement caused Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Commission, to exclaim: "If that's so, it is an outrage and ought to be remedied."

Numerous other witnesses testified to similar differences between the domestic and export prices of ship plates and of other shipbuilding materials.

SENATOR BACON'S EVIDENCE ON STEEL RAILS, BARB WIRE, ETC.

Senator AUGUSTUS O. BACON, of Georgia, produces some strong evidence of export prices in his speech in the Senate, April 25, 1904. He had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter to him from Mr. James T. Wright, vice-president and general manager of the Macon, Dublin and Savannah Railroad Company. Senator BACON stated that Mr. Wright was an Indianian and a Republican. In his letter to Senator BACON, Mr. Wright states that his railroad was compelled to pay $29 a ton for 5,618 tons of steel rails, although the same steel company that charged him $29 offered to sell him rails for Honduras at $20, the rails to be loaded upon vessels chartered to a foreign port. Commenting upon these prices Mr. Wright said:

"Allowing a liberal amount for cost of delivery at tide water, which in this particular case would have been very small, we American citizens paid to this American industry $33,000 in excess of what foreigners would have been compelled to pay. And $33,000 would have put up a very handsome library filled with standard books on protection.

"And this was a very small transaction—only 50 miles of railroad! Payments were cash, and neither needed nor asked any concessions in the matter of time. Because we were Americans, interested in the development of a small section of our country, involving faith and sacrifices, we were compelled to pay out as a bonus in excess of $600 per mile."

Senator BACON also had printed in the RECORD a letter from Mr. W. G. Raoul, president of the National Railroad Company of Mexico. It was dated February 25, 1904. In it Mr. Raoul said:

"For a long time past all our purchases have been made on the basis of export prices, even though they have occasionally stopped in Texas, the competition being keen enough to produce this cut in prices in favor of the Texas shipments, so that it has been some time past since we have had any material differences, but those differences do exist, and to an iniquitous extent. I use the word 'iniquitous' because it certainly seems to me when the citizens of the United States are required under the laws of the country to pay a higher price to the manufacturers than these same manufacturers are willing to make and sell to foreign people for. In 1902 I secured bids on steel rails for Mexico from United States mills at about $24, delivered at Tampico, while the price I paid at the same time for rails for our road in Texas was $28 at the mills.

"I have understood that the Canadian Pacific has just bought a large lot of rails from the United States Steel Corporation at $21. It is asserted and denied that the $21 is for delivery at Montreal. If it is, the price at the mill would be about $19, while the price for United States roads is still $28 at the mills. I do not know this of my own knowledge, and it is merely current report."

The following extracts from Senator BACON'S speech further elucidate the statements in the letters:

"I stop there to note that the $24 was the price, delivered at Tampico, for rails which were to be used for a part of the road in Mexico. Of course, from the $24 was necessarily deducted the cost of transportation, so far as the receipt of the manufacturer is concerned, and for the road, so far as it lay in Texas, at the mills the price was $28 a ton. So if you allow even $4 as the cost of transportation, there was a difference of $8 a ton between the price charged by the manufacturers for rails sold to the same party where he was to use a part of them in Texas and to use the other part in Mexico.

"Twenty-four dollars was the price at Tampico, and in that case, of course, the manufacturer paid the freight to Tampico, and that was for rails to be used in Mexico; but for rails which were to be used in Texas the price was $28 at the mills, which would have required the railroad company, of course, to pay the freight.

"If $4 was the cost of transportation at a difference of $8 a ton between the price charged by the maker of the steel rails to the same person where he had a railroad line partly in Texas and partly in Mexico, he paid $8 more for the rail to be laid in Texas than for the rail to be laid in Mexico.

"Mr. BLACKBURN. At the same time?

"Mr. BACON. At the same time; not, as suggested by the learned Senator from Rhode Island, when there was a difference in pig iron, or the cost of labor, or anything else. Here is $8 a ton, about representing the difference made up by the $7.84 a ton duty.

"In these two cases here are the actual prices stated by a customer. In each case it is the same rail by the same manufacturer to the same customer at the same time, and in each case there is a discrimination of the price to this same customer of the same rail at the same time as between the rail to be used in the foreign country and the rail to be used at home."

SENATOR BACON'S EVIDENCE ON EXPORT PRICES OF BARBED WIRE.

In the same speech Senator BACON said:

"Barbed wire has increased in price, certainly, considerably over 100 per cent, if not nearly 200 per cent, not very recently, but at the time when it was taken into the trust and very soon thereafter.

"I have a letter from an exporter in New York City, voluntarily written to me. In which he states that the price to him for barbed wire to be exported to South America is $2.20 per hundred pounds, while to the man in the United States the price of barbed wire is from $2.90 to $3 per hundred pounds. In other words, the farmer in South America can fence his fields with barbed wire made in the United States and sold to him in the United States at a less price than that at which the farmer in the United States can buy barbed wire from the same man in the United States to fence his field with. Under the operation of the present tariff law the American farmer is compelled to pay to the barbed-wire manufacturers in the United States at least 40 per cent more than the South American farmer is required to pay when he buys exactly the same wire from the same man in the United States.

FOREIGN OFFICIAL EVIDENCE.

The British Blue Book on "British and Foreign Trade and Industrial Conditions," prepared by the board of trade and issued late in 1903, contains much evidence of foreign goods sold lower in Great Britain than in the countries of their origin. The evidence relates principally, if not entirely, to Germany, Austria-Hungary, and the United States—all protected countries.

The evidence shows that German coal, coke, pig iron, steel billets, rails and girders, wire, wire nails, ship plates, and paper are sold much cheaper in England than in Germany, the difference, in the case of steel rails, amounting to 20 per cent, and in the case of wire nails to over 50 per cent of the German home prices. It shows that American steel (tin plate) bars, ship plates, steel billets, and merchant iron and steel were then selling in Great Britain at prices far below those prevailing in the United States.

This evidence is proof that like conditions produce like results, and that manufacturers in protected markets in any country are likely to compel their customers at home to pay higher prices for goods than those charged foreign customers.

THE CHAMBERLAIN TARIFF COMMISSION REPORT.

The Chamberlain tariff commission is made up of about sixty of the leading business men of England. During several months it has been taking testimony on the need of tariff duties to prevent the "dumping" of foreign goods in England. The establishment of this commission, and, indeed, the whole fiscal agitation in Great Britain, are the result of the methods of selling goods in the free British market practiced by the protected manufacturers of foreign countries, especially of Germany and the United States.

The first volume of the report of this commission, which is an unofficial body, was issued in July, 1904. It relates to iron and steel only. A great number of British manufacturers, covering every branch of their great iron and steel industry, either testified personally before the commission or sent in written statements in answer to very thoroughly prepared question sheets submitted to the trade by the commission. The evidence, showing sales in the British market by manufacturers of iron and steel products in Germany and in the United States at prices greatly below the domestic prices charged by the same manufacurers in those countries to domestic consumers, is overwhelming and startling. The conclusions of the commission in respect to the facts are fully sustained by the evidence. With their proposed remedy, namely, the imposition of duties by Great Britain upon importations of iron and steel from Germany and the United States, we have nothing to do in this pamphlet, but the evidence showing the sales by American manufacturers in the British market at prices greatly below the domestic prices in the United States is directly pertinent to our inquiry. The evidence taken before this commission is very voluminous. A few extracts, typical of the whole, make interesting reading for American consumers of iron and steel products.

EVIDENCE OF ENGLISH FIRMS AS TO PRICES OF "DUMPED" GOODS.

Firm No. 898: "Pig iron from the United States is imported into this country below cost price here. Our customers are buying at 5s. per ton less than we can produce at, and the Americans are reported to be selling for export to England at a price equivalent to 8s. per ton lower than the price at which they are supplying their own country."

Firm No. 1147: "We were informed by an American mattress maker last summer that American wire, which could be bought in Birmingham at £18 per ton, was sold for £21 in the States, and when freight, etc., is taken into consideration, this would be a drop of between 15 per cent to 20 per cent. Our price in Birmingham is £18 10s., but 90 per cent of the wire used by mattress makers in Birmingham is American, and doubtless the same condition prevails in other towns."

GERMAN AND AMERICAN BARS.

Firm No. 1512: "The following are the prices of German and American bars for export to this country and for their own trade:

"German bars.—Export, per ton, 77s. d/d works in Wales. Home market, per ton, 92s. 6d. f. o. b. maker's works.

"American bars.—Export, per ton, 76s. d/d works in Wales. Home market, per ton, $28, or £5 16s. 8d. f. o. b. maker's works.

"Price of Welsh bars, 80s. to 85s. delivered.

"Tariff on steel bars into Germany, 23s. 5d. per ton.

"Tariff on steel bars into United States of America, 46s. 8d. per ton."

Firm No. 478: "Messrs. A. B. C., of Sheffield, used to buy large quantities of steel from us for export to (colony). They now buy in the States and ship direct to (colony). They never see it; only invoice it and pocket the profit. How is tariff reform going to deal with this?"

BRITISH LOSING CANADIAN MARKET FOR TIN PLATES.

Firms Nos. 1510 and 1511: "Our experience is that we are fast losing the Canadian market for tin plates, and the Americans have recently sold at least 100,000 boxes there, while it is reported that they have also taken orders for Australia.

"The Iron Age of February 4, 1904, page 48, gives the price of 20 by 14 tin plates at $3.64 f. o. b. Chicago, or 15s. 9d. a box. The present price of English tin plate is about 10s. 9d., net, f. o. b. Swansea. Notwithstanding this difference in favor of our tin plates, the Americans have booked Canadian orders at a price delivered Canada less than f. o. b. Swansea price of English plates. The tariff put on tin plates by the United States has completely killed our trade with that country except as regards a small export of tin plate for reexportation, on which a rebate of 99 per cent of the tariff is allowed."

Witness No. 1 (505): "In Canada we suffer from American competition. I lost an order for 1,000 tons of steel rails there last week. America also competes in Australia and at the Cape, but not so keenly as in Canada. I can not give you the reason for the loss of the order for 1,000 tons of rails; the order was intended for Cape Breton, and was worked through Glasgow merchants, who assured us we would get the order. We lost it in spite of the 33 per cent preference."

DUMPING PRICES FOR THREE YEARS.

Witness No. 2 (545): "The practical working of the dumping process is shown by comparing the prices at which cheap bars and billets are sold here from Germany and the United States during the past three years and the prices at the same time in the countries of origin:

Prices of American and German products in United Kingdom.			Price in—
			Germany.	United States.
	s.	d.	s.	s.
Nov., 1901. German sheet bars delivered works port United Kingdom	81	3
Freight	9	6
	71	9	95	.....
Aug., 1902. German billets delivered works inland	88	0
Freight	17	2
	70	10	95	.....
Jan., 1903. German sheet bars delivered port United Kingdom	78	6
Freight	9	6
	69	0	94	.....
Jan., 1904. United States billets delivered works inland	81	3
Freight	24	1
	57	2	.....	92
Jan., 1904. United States sheet bars delivered port United Kingdom	78	0

	61	7	.....	96
Jan., 1904. German billets f. o. b. Rotterdam	70	0
Freight	5	0
	65	0	90	.....

"The prices given of steel delivered in the United Kingdom are actual contracts; the prices in Germany and the United States are taken from the Iron and Coal Trades Review. * * * Similar difference exists in the German and United States prices at home and abroad of rails, sheet iron, nails, wire rods, etc."

SELLING PRICES OF TUBES IN PROTECTED COUNTRIES.

Witness No. 12 (820): "It is a fact that tubes are sold at higher prices in protected countries than the same countries export and sell at in Great Britain. On February 18, 1904, I got from the British consul at Pittsburg, America, the discounts from the American price lists that the tubes are being sold at in Pittsburg—that is, the largest seat of manufacturing of American tubes. That was in truck loads of 5 tons. When I worked out this on the American price lists, less the discounts given me, and at per thousand feet—taking a thousand feet of each of the sizes for which I am able to get a price, namely, fourteen, making a total of 14,000 feet—I got a net sum that they would pay in Pittsburg of £420 4s. 1d., and on the same date—and it fortunately happens that it was the same date—I got a quotation from the United Steel Products Company of America, practically the selling spot for some of the large American works, for tubes delivered in the Thames, London. These discounts are quoted from the English price list. I took a thousand feet of each of these fourteen sizes—they are the running sizes of the trade—and less the discounts which they gave me it made for the 14,000 feet £332 14s. 6d., so that the American is really dumping in the Thames, at £87 9s. 7d., for this quantity of tubes, less price than he is obtaining at the point of manufacture, where he has neither to pay freight nor carriage. In other words, he is selling at 26.25 per cent higher price in Pittsburg than he is selling these same tubes in the Thames."

Witness No. 13 (864): "In July, 1904, the American bars came in, and they were actually being sold at £5 5s. a ton c. i. f. against our price of £7 at that time, and the buyers completely held off buying tin plates, and there was a fortnight's stoppage of all the tin-plate works."

STEEL MANUFACTURING COSTS IN UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.

Witness No. 16 (1023, 1026, 1045, 1046): "The cost of converting pig iron into steel in the United States must, in the majority of cases, be somewhat less than the corresponding cost in this country, despite the fact that wages there are materially higher. * * * I do not hesitate to say that if the Canadians had been charged the same prices as were nominally charged on the other side of the line, hardly any American iron and steel would have found its way into Canada during the last five years in competition with the cheaper prices quoted for British material.

"A firm employing nearly 1,500 hands, writing in February, states that the current price of basic pig iron in Germany was then 58 marks per ton. The lowest cost at which this could be converted into steel joists and beams could not be less than 31 marks per ton. Yet these German joists, costing not less than 89 marks, were being offered f. o. b. Antwerp at 82½ marks per ton, less 2½ per cent discount. The home price in Germany for joists f. o. b. at works was 105 marks. Similarly the current price for pig iron at Pittsburg was $13 (54s. 1d.); the cost of manufacturing these into billets could not have been less than $5.50 (27s. 1d.) per ton, making together 81s. 2d. Yet these were being delivered c. i. f., any British port, at 75s. per ton, making a difference of 6s. 2d. per ton, exclusive of sea freight and land freight from Pittsburg to the American port. The home prices for these billets at Pittsburg was $24 (100s.)."

On the voluminous and very complete evidence taken before them this commission of merchants came to the following conclusions on the subject of "dumping:"

"DUMPING" A CONTINUOUS AND ORGANIZED SYSTEM.

"It is, in our opinion, impossible to maintain that dumping is merely a temporary expedient, unprofitable to the countries which practice it, and, therefore, certain to be abandoned. In fact, the evidence indicates that dumping is a part of an organized policy. The evidence further suggests that, just as foreign competition, commencing at the lower stages of production, has, as we have shown, gradually extended, so foreign countries must inevitably find it profitable to dump in branch after branch of the more finished manufactures as their productive power increases."

Much evidence was taken also before this commission on the effect of trusts, syndicates, and cartels in establishing and maintaining the system of selling products in foreign markets at prices greatly below the home price. The evidence is very interesting, but we have not space to review it in this pamphlet. The commission came to the following conclusion:

TRUSTS AND CARTELS.

Among the witnesses we have examined and in the returns made by manufacturers there is some diversity of opinion as to the effect of trusts and cartels, so far as the promotion of economics of production is concerned, but there is a general agreement that, in association with the tariff policy of the countries concerned, the trusts and syndicates of the United States, and more particularly the cartels of Germany, are a powerful aid in securing the control of the home market, and, as a consequence, in regulating the export trade."

"THE HOME CONSUMER PAYS THE BILL."

(a) If these sales in foreign markets are made by American manufacturers at a fair profit, obviously, even from a protectionist point of view, they are able to produce at prices which render any protective tariff not only unnecessary, but a gross oppression upon the home consumer. It is only by reason of the tariff, which excludes foreign competition, and by monopolization of the home market by trusts and combinations, that the domestic consumers can be compelled to pay the high domestic prices. Repeal or radical reduction of the tariff on these products would necessarily bring down the price to a reasonable basis.

(b) If such sales in foreign markets are made by American manufacturers at a loss (highly improbable as a continuous proceeding), then that loss must be recouped by exactions in the home market. In either case, whether of actual loss or very low profit, the American consumer pays the bill. Apparently in explanation or justification of these low export prices, it is argued that the goods are sold abroad at cost, and sometimes below cost, but that the productive capacity of American mills is greater than is necessary to supply the home demand, and that by keeping the mills running continuously and obtaining a much larger product, the cost of the whole product is greatly lowered, economies being thus made in labor and fuel and incidental expenses. It is argued that so great is the advantage from keeping the mills running to their full capacity, or as near that as practicable, that it pays to sell the surplus in foreign markets at almost any price that can be obtained. The whole transaction, it is claimed, shows a profit. That is to say, by exacting tremendous prices from the home consumer, the profit on the much greater quantity of the product sold at home recoups the loss on the foreign sales, and leaves a handsome profit for dividends upon hugely excessive capitalization. If this justification is satisfactory to the American consumer, there is nothing more to be said. From the manufacturers' standpoint it may be satisfactory, but the domestic consumer obtains little or none of the advantages alleged to result from a production greater than is necessary for the supply of the home market. As Mr. Phillips pointed out in his minority report as a member of the Industrial Commission, the domestic high price greatly restricts home consumption, and is the chief cause of the surplus product. With a fair home price domestic consumption would be greatly increased. If by continuous production the cost of producing each unit is so greatly reduced that domestic prices could be made lower than would be practicable if production was more limited, the combinations within the shelter of the tariff enable the producer to reap the benefit. The consumer receives little or no part of it, because the prices are not reduced. The arguments present no justification for the continuance of such an artificial condition of affairs at the expense of domestic consumers. If the tariff duties were removed, or greatly reduced, the production of iron and steel would be measured by such a supply as could be disposed of either at home or abroad at fair prices.

All the evidence, including that of the most experienced American manufacturers, shows that in the great branches of the iron and steel industry they can produce more cheaply than anywhere in the world, and without any tariff at all have no reason to fear foreign competition. It is not improbable that without a tariff they would not be able to maintain prices that would give returns adequate to pay large dividends upon the tremendous overcapitalization which has prevailed in these industries of recent years. What importance, however, should the general public attach to that?

THE SIZE OF THE BILL.

The total value of manufactured goods sold to final consumers in this country can hardly be less than $6,000,000,000, and may be as high as $8,000,000,000. If, as is reasonable and probable, these goods are worth 20 per cent more in the home market than they would command for export, or more than they would command in our markets were there no tariff-protected trusts and monopolies in control here, then we are paying something more than $1,000,000,000 a year for our tariff whistle. This is the cost at wholesale prices. At retail prices the cost of "protection" is probably $1,500,000,000 or $1,600,000,000. This is about $90 per family for our entire population. This is the cost to us of a system that greatly hampers and restricts our foreign trade directly, through the high tariff duties on imported goods, and indirectly through the handicap which it puts upon our manufacturers and farmers when it compels them to pay for more materials, machinery, implements, and supplies than is paid by their foreign competitors. It is the cost to us of having our manufacturing industries conducted by huge monopolies, heavily overcapitalized, corrupting politics, engaging constantly in stock jobbing, and using foul means to get rid of small and independent manufacturers. Do we—that is, 99 out of 100 of us who do not pocket tariff taxes—get value received?

There is no compensating benefit to labor when goods are sold at higher prices in the home market, for in order to maintain these higher prices production must be restricted. With home prices lowered to the level of foreign prices far more goods would be consumed and far more labor would be employed in producing them. This would mean steadier employment and increased yearly earnings if not increased weekly wages.

EVIDENCE FROM TRADE JOURNALS, NEWSPAPERS, ETC.

Besides the great amount of official and unofficial evidence as to the difference between export and home prices of manufactured goods, trade journals, newspapers, and letters from manufacturers and dealers furnish no end of facts as to export prices. Only a few of these will be cited here.

INGRATITUDE OF TIN PLATE TRUST.

The tin plate trust has for over two years been selling plates to the Southern Cotton Oil Company and other exporting manufacturers of canned goods at about $1 per box below the regular prices. It offered to meet the Welsh prices (about $1.50 per box of 100 pounds below the American price, the duty being $1.50 per box) on an order for 1,500,000 boxes from the Standard Oil Company, if the workingmen would accept a 25 per cent reduction in wages. The compromise was arranged and reduced wages were accepted until September, 1903, and extended to 1904 and 1905. Thus these workers are now working at reduced wages in order that the manufacturers may sell tin plate for export at two-thirds of the prices charged in the home market.

The tariff on tin plates has cost this country over $100,000,000 during the last twelve years. As soon as the manufacturers could produce as cheaply as foreigners they got together and formed a trust and put up the price from $2.80 per box in 1898 to $4.84 in 1900. It is now $3.64.

The ingratitude of the protected trusts and manufacturers is monumental. They accept charity from us until they become strong, then they utilize to the fullest the power which the tariff gives them to charge us exorbitant prices, and to our protests they merely reply: "What are you going to do about it?"

EXPORT PRICES OF FILES.

In February, 1904, the literary bureau of the Democratic Congressional committee received a letter from Henry Rossell & Co. (Limited), Sheffield, England., large manufacturers and dealers in files and tool steel. This letter says:

"As an illustration of the unfair manner in which home buyers of files are treated by the United States manufacturers, I inclose you herewith a comparison of the prices charged to the buyers in the United States with those offered by the same manufacturers here."

Some of the prices on the list inclosed follow:

Comparative prices of American files in America and England.

Articles.	Price per dozen.		Difference.
	England.	United States.
			Per ct.
Flat bastard, 4 inches	$0.34	$0.92	170
Flat bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.07	114
Flat bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.75	62
Hand bastard, 4 inches	.38	.92	142
Hand bastard, 6 inches	.62	1.07	73
Hand bastard, 10 inches	1.30	1.87	44
Half-round bastard, 4 inches	.34	1.20	253
Half-round bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.52	204
Half-round bastard, 10 inches	1.08	2.27	108
Round bastard, 4 inches	.34	.75	121
Round bastard, 6 inches	.50	.87	74
Round bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.40	30
Square bastard, 4 inches	.34	.95	179
Square bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.15	130
Square bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.85	71

From these figures we see that the American File Association, which has not revised its price list to American buyers since November 1, 1899, is charging us for most kinds of its small files more than twice as much as it charges Englishmen for these same files, and for half-round files we must pay them three times the price charged Englishmen.

On July 30, 1904, the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin contained the following:

"One of the most interesting features of the steel situation is an important sale of several thousand tons of steel plates for export, the price of £5 delivered at Newcastle-on-the-Tyne, netting the mills about 90 cents per net ton, f. o. b. Pittsburg. It should be remembered that sales are made in the English market by the gross ton; allowing $3.50 freight rates and a slight allowance for insurance, this price would net the mills $20 gross, or $1.80 per net ton, or 90 cents per 100, against $1.60 per 100 for domestic business."

A POLICY THAT HANDICAPS AMERICANS AND FAVORS FOREIGNERS.

Irrespective of the gross injustice of which manufacturers are guilty when they utilize their protection to compel home consumers to pay more than a fair price for goods and more than foreigners are regularly paying, there are other important reasons why this practice should be discouraged rather than encouraged by tariff legislation. These reasons hold good even if the generally accepted theories of protection are true.

It is a bad economic policy for a nation so to legislate that its own manufacturers and workers must pay more for materials and goods than is paid by foreigners for these same materials and goods.

1. Such a policy handicaps home manufacturers of finished goods and gives their foreign competitors a great advantage, not only in foreign markets, but often in home markets, even when tariff duties are fairly high on such commodities.

2. Instead of encouraging and building up home industries, such a policy discourages and drags them down by enabling finished goods to be manufactured more cheaply abroad. Foreign manufacturers can produce more cheaply because they can obtain many of the raw materials from our protected manufacturers cheaper than their American competitors can obtain them. Hence foreign manufacturers can often, because of our tariff laws, undersell American manufacturers of finished goods in foreign and, sometimes, in our domestic markets.

3. Such a policy leads to retaliatory tariffs on the part of foreign countries which wish to save their industries from some of the evils of what is called the "dumping" process.

An impressive illustration of the effect of such a policy in inducing retaliation is found in the recent action of Canada in establishing a countervailing duty against "dumped" exports from the United States. These duties were first imposed in June, 1904, and in his budget speech of June 9 the Canadian minister of finance said that the government proposed to levy these extra duties because of the great and rapidly increasing quantity of manufactured goods made in the United States and sold in Canada in competition with domestic products, at prices far below those prevailing in the United States for similar commodities. The Canadian customs officials, on the entry of foreign merchandise, now make an inquiry into the price of such merchandise in the country of export, and if such price is found to exceed the invoice price, an additional duty equal to the whole difference is assessed. In this manner that government hopes to protect its domestic manufacturers against what is virtually an "export bounty" resulting from the high tariff in the exporting country.

Another illustration is found in the new tariff established in Mexico on April 1, 1904, which, it appears, is intended to keep out American manufactured goods sold in Mexico at lower prices than in the United States.

Another illustration is the protectionist agitation in Great Britain, which is largely based on a demand for retaliation against the United States and Germany.

4. Such a policy tends strongly to induce manufacturers who might otherwise do an extensive export business to establish branch factories in foreign countries, where they can manufacture more cheaply; where they can, in fact, get more benefits from "protection" than they get at home.

The extent of the injury done by this absurd and foolish policy in driving industries out of this country is only just beginning to be recognized by the protectionists. Attention was called to it officially in the special article on iron and steel in the August, 1900, Report of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Finance, extracts from which are printed on pages 4–5, supra.

HIGH REPUBLICAN AUTHORITY FOR ASSERTING THAT OUR TARIFF SYSTEM IS CAUSING AN EXODUS OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The following extracts are taken from an article in the January, 1904, Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, entitled "The Tariff and the Export Trade of the United States," by a leading Republican, Mr. S. N. D. North, Director of the Census. In this article, after showing the heavy burden of tariff duties upon wool and other raw materials, and after asserting that American manufacturers are not greatly handicapped by the higher wages here because, man for man, the average American workman can accomplish more work, in a given time, and do better work, than the average workingman of any other country, and can thus offset in a very considerable degree, the difference in day wages between our own and all European countries, Mr. North says:

"It remains the fact that a constantly increasing number of our great manufacturing corporations are constructing vast plants abroad to supply their foreign customers; and, of course, they would not do this unless experience proved there was an advantage in it. I have before me a long list of these establishments. It indicates that more than $40,000,000 of American money is now invested in European plants devoted to the manufacture of various American specialties, including all descriptions of electric apparatus, sewing machines, belting, radiators, shoe machinery, coal-conveying apparatus, steel chains, machine tools, hoisting machinery, boilers, pumps, blowing engines, mining machinery, printing machinery, elevators, match-making machinery, pneumatic tools and photographic apparatus.

"The Western Electric Company, of Chicago, Ill., is interested in extensive factories in London, Paris, Antwerp, and Berlin, not all of them carried under the name of that company, but all of them established and controlled by its capital. The General Electric Company has three or four such establishments, and has recently constructed a hugh new factory in Rugby, England. The Westinghouse Company has just finished, at Trafford Park, in England, one of the largest electric factories in Europe, employing two or three thousand men, and it has other factories in Havre, France, and St. Petersburg, Russia. The Singer Sewing Machine Company has three large plants in Europe, under its direct control. The Chicago American Tool Company is building a plant at Frazerburg, near Aberdeen. The Howe printing presses are made in London, as is also the American linotype machinery. The Draper Company has recently completed its new factory in Lancashire, to supply the greatest cotton manufacturing district of the world with American fast-running Northrup looms. This list might be extended indefinitely, and a fine field for investigation opened for the full measurement of this remarkable transplantation.

"Much has been written about the invasion of foreign manufacturing capital in the United States, for the construction of factories to supply the American market in competition with American manufacturers. A great deal of such capital has found investment here, particularly in the textiles; but the sum total of this American investment of foreign manufacturing capital is a bagatelle in comparison with the American manufacturing capital which has found investment in European countries within the last fifteen years, and is now engaged in maunfacturing what is known as American goods on foreign soil. The irruption of American wares, of which the foreign manufacturers have complained so loudly of late, is an interesting and significant phenomenon in connection with the question under discussion. Far more significant, it seems to me, is this construction of American factories on foreign soil to construct American machinery and appliances by American methods, in direct competition with the strongest foreign establishments and in bold and avowed determination to control the markets of the world.

"Can it be fairly argued that the protective tariff is driving these American manufacturers abroad in order to obtain advantages for competition in the world's market of which that tariff deprives them at home?

"I will conclude, therefore, by brief allusion to an aspect of the subject suggested by the remarkable invasion of American manufacturing capital and enterprise into the European countries, for the purpose of a hand-to-hand competition on their own soil. It will necessarily result—it has already resulted—in a large diminution of our export trade in American manufactures.

"Instead of making in America electrical apparatus, cotton looms, all kinds of machinery, tools, etc., to ship abroad for sale, our manufacturers will increasingly produce these wares abroad for their foreign trade, and the statistics of our exports will be correspondingly reduced. They are already so reduced in value and amount to many millions of dollars every year. It may easily come out, in the course of time, that the volume of our foreign trade in manufactures, instead of increasing by leaps and bounds, as it has been doing, will gradually become stationary, and even show a decline."

The following, from the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, of New York, March 28, 1904, bears out the remarkable statement of Mr. North:

LARGE SINGER PLANT TO BE BUILT IN CANADA.

"The Singer Manufacturing Company, of Elizabethport, N. J., local offices Singer Building, Broadway and Liberty street, is to build another extensive plant outside of the United States, a site having been secured at St. John, N. B. The Singer people have large plants operating at Kilbowie, Scotland; near Trieste, Austria, and in the vicinity of Moscow, Russia. A big factory is also under construction about halfway between Hamburg and Berlin, Germany.

"Mexican advices state that the Mexican Car and Foundry Company, S. A., has been organized in Mexico City to operate under the concessions granted by the Mexican Government to Isaac M. Hutchinson, who represents the interests in the Southern republic of the American Locomotive Company, the Niles-Bement-Pond Company, A. L. Ide & Sons, the Chicago Pneumatic Tool Company, etc. The capital of the company is $1,000,000 gold. Construction work has already been begun and will be pushed to completion as soon as possible. The initial capacity of the plant will be increased as rapidly as additional machinery can be installed."

In this line are the following extracts from an editorial in the Iron Age of March 31, 1904:

"The advance in Mexican tariff rates, which goes into effect this week, is likely to cause a number of American manufacturers to establish branch factories there. * * *

"The Mexican situation almost parallels that of Canada, the difference being that the latter country not only maintains high duties on most manufactured products, but also discriminates in favor of Great Britain. Numerous American manufacturers have established branch factories in Canada, and the movement has by no means ended, rather important developments of this character having been very recently announced. It may be assumed that in both of these border countries American capital will continue to be invested as long as the Government is stable and the investment appears reasonably safe."

INFLUENCE OF DRAWBACK DUTIES AND EXPORT BOUNTIES ON EXPORT PRICES.

In Germany and some other European countries which have adopted high protective tariffs, export bounties have had an important influence upon the sales of goods in foreign markets at prices much lower than the domestic price.

In the United States, however, there are no direct export bounties. But it should not be overlooked that in the case of a powerful combination, controlling much the larger part of domestic production in a line of manufacture, our extremely high tariff acts substantially as an export bounty. When, for example, the steel corporations sell steel bars and billets and other forms of partially manufactured steel in Great Britain at prices from 30 to 50 per cent lower than the same manufacturers exact at home, the excessive domestic price, which, by virtue of the tariff they are enabled to charge, differs very little in result from a direct export bounty paid by the Government out of the proceeds of taxation.

In nearly all commercial countries drawback duties are allowed on exported goods manufactured in whole or in part from imported materials on which duties have been paid at the time of importation. These drawbacks do undoubtedly explain much of the difference between the export and domestic prices on a few articles, such as tin cans manufactured from imported tin; molasses, sirup, refined sugar, and confectionery manufactured from imported raw sugar; leather made from imported hides, and bags made from imported burlaps, etc. But the great bulk of our manufactured articles exported and sold in foreign markets at greatly reduced prices, contain no imported raw materials whatever. This is conclusively shown when it is considered that the total amount of drawbacks paid by the United States in 1903 was only $5,058,862, of which nearly $2,000,000 was paid on tin cans alone, and of which fully three-fourths was paid on the articles above enumerated. For example, the great exportations of iron and steel, which afford the most flagrant instances of low export and excessive domestic prices, contain no imported materials and are not affected by drawback allowances.

III. VERY DIFFICULT TO OBTAIN EXPORT PRICES.

Having produced much evidence, official and unofficial, as to the difference between export and home prices, and as to the extent of the practice of selling cheaper for export, some tables of prices will be given. Although these tables state the export and home prices of more articles and classes of articles than were ever before stated in similar tables, yet it is certain that this list does not mention one-fifth of the articles thus sold cheaper for export than to home consumers.

The difficulty of obtaining both export and home prices for the purpose of comparing them is very great. Both the trusts, which manufacture the most of the goods exported, and the independent manufacturers, who sell many goods abroad usually have "export" price lists and often "export" catalogues which differ radically from those used in the domestic market. These export lists and catalogues circulate only in certain foreign countries, and are so closely guarded that it is very difficult for any but an export merchant to obtain them in this country. Some of them can not be obtained even by old and well-known export agents.

There are nearly 300 export commission houses in New York City. Some of the largest of these publish weekly or monthly export trade journals. These are a mixture of catalogues and price lists, and circulate only in foreign countries. They do not usually quote the lowest prices for export. Some of them, and noably the Exporters and Importers' Journal, refer to a special discount sheet, which prints the lowest export prices. The Democratic Congressional committee in 1902 obtained this sheet only after offering a reward of $100 for it. It came from a merchant in a foreign country. The Democratic campaign book of 1902 contained a considerable list of articles sold cheaper abroad than at home. Had the discount sheet been obtained a month sooner, so that more time would have been left in which to obtain home prices, a very much longer list could have been printed.

While the tariff committee has been unable to obtain this special discount sheet for any month in 1904, it has been able to obtain copies of several recent export journals, notably (1) The Exporters' and Importers' Journal of June 18, 1904, published by Henry W. Peabody, No. 17 State street, New York City; (2) The American Export Monthly of June 18, 1904, published by Arkell & Douglas, Nos. 5 to 11 Broadway, New York City; (3) The Export World and Herald of July 5, 1904, published by the American Trading Company, Broad Exchange Building, New York City; (4) El Mundo y Heraldo de la Exportacion of June 21, 1904, also published by the American Trading Company.

While many of the prices quoted from the journals are not the lowest export prices, yet they are often far below the home prices on the articles mentioned.

To supplement and corroborate the information derived from these export journals, the tariff committee employed a man who has for twenty years been a buyer of goods for export.

Being personally acquainted with the selling agents of many of these exporting manufacturers, this man could and did obtain the export catalogues and price lists of most of the manufacturers here quoted. Many of these price lists are in the possession of the tariff reform committee. In most cases the manufacturers themselves, or their agents, have marked their discounts for export on the margins of their catalogues or lists. Sometimes they have also indicated their home discounts in the same way. In other cases the expert who obtained these prices wrote them on the margins of the lists as they were given to him. All of these prices were obtained in June, July, and August, 1904.

From the information thus obtained the following comparative lists of prices have been prepared. They are not usually bottom prices, because they were not given to a man who had actual orders for goods in hand. Besides, all exporting manufacturers allow a commission to the buyers of goods for export. This commission is seldom or never less than 1 per cent and is sometimes as high as 5 per cent.

The home prices are believed to be the lowest for quantities of goods similar to those on which export prices are quoted. They were obtained from manufacturers, from domestic price lists, from market quotations, and from merchants who are buyers for domestic consumption.

[In order to save space the names of the manufacturers of the articles mentioned in the following tables have been omitted.]

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep informed regarding compliance with the "Act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," approved March 2, 1893, including the employment of inspectors to execute and enforce the requirements of the said act, $85,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 17, by striking out "eighty-five" and inserting "one hundred."

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand the Committee on Appropriations has done the proper thing for that committee to do—not to go beyond the amount of the estimate. It is also true that we have been informed in our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the force of inspectors for the enforcement of the safety-appliance act is too small. In the year 1904, which is the last year for which there is a report, there were 3,416 railway employees killed and 36,413 injured in train movement. In the same year there were 3,662 employees killed on the railroads and 67,067 injured. In the same year there were 10,046 persons killed on the railroads and 84,155 injured. Now, it does seem to me, when practically the only provision the Government makes for the safety of employees on railroads is the safety appliances, there ought to be a sufficient sum to employ an ample number of inspectors to see that the safety air brakes are in condition; that the grab irons are properly put on the cars; that the automatic couplers are properly installed on all cars and engines, and that the proper safety appliances, as required by the act, are provided by the railroads.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. The committee has given to the Interstate Commerce Commission all the money for this purpose that the Commission estimated to be necessary and that the Commission believe they can expend properly. When the chairman of the Commission and the secretary of the Commission were before the committee, Mr. Moseley, the secretary, spoke directly to this point, and gave the reason why more money could not be advantageously expended. He said:

You know, Mr. Chairman, that I came up here and asked you for money in addition to the $75,000—

He was then referring to the increase of $10,000 allowed in the urgent deficiency bill at the beginning of the session—that is, the unexpended balance which we had left over from the former year—

They expended about $8,000 less than the amount appropriated—

But I told you that I did not know whether we were going to spend it. I think we may be able to save it. Mr. MANN, of Illinois, on the floor some time ago said that this bureau ought to be largely increased. The difficulty is, sir, that this properly must be a matter of slow growth. We want to get the best men we can and we want to feel our way. We do not want to build up a great establishment like the Life-Saving Bureau, spending from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 a year. We do not want to build up anything of that sort. We had the same amount of money last year, with the reappropriation given us, which we are asking this year.

Mr. KNAPP. I want to indorse that statement with a word of comment. Of course the secretary has taken a peculiar interest in this matter of the safety of railway employees, and, as everybody knows, his interest and activity had very much to do with the passage of the law, as it has to-day with its administration, but I think it would be very unwise for the Government to appropriate $500,000 or a million dollars for this purpose on the theory that if a little of this is a good thing a great deal of it would be better.

Now, I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman from Illinois in respect to the efficient inspection of cars and these safety appliances. But I do not believe that our sympathy should lead us to appropriate more money for the purpose of carrying out the provision of this law than those charged with administrating the law say can be expended wisely. There is no principle upon which such action could possibly be justified if the House or Committee of the Whole should attempt to take it. I trust that the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The quesion is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of fractional silver coin: For transportation of fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $75,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this last paragraph by striking out the word "fractional" in line 22, page 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, line 22, strike out the word "fractional."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I believe in every year heretofore, since we have been coining silver dollars, there has been a provision for their transportation from the mints where they are coined to the banks or other parties desiring them, at the expense of the Government.

In the sundry civil bill passed March 3, 1905, for the current year ending June 30, 1906, the language used in the law, under the head of the transportation of silver coin, was this:

For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $120,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury to subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so.

Now, in the bill as reported, the word "fractional" is put in to qualify what follows, "silver coin;" and if this bill as originally drawn should become a law there will be no free transportation of silver dollars for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

There was an apparent deficiency in the matter of the transportation of silver dollars this year, and it will be remembered that I attempted to have a provision made to meet that apparent impending deficiency. I understand the Treasury Department has gotten along without having any particular trouble, and it has been transporting silver dollars. So, as I have already stated, it has been the custom from year to year to provide, in the sundry civil bill, an appropriation for the purpose of transporting silver dollars from the mints, or from the depositories where they are kept, to the banks and to parties desiring them. This is but just.

In the city of Philadelphia the banks get their silver coin free, because they are beside the mint. In the city of New York they do the same thing, because silver dollars are deposited in the custom-house there. And so, I might say, silver dollars are now coined in San Francisco; and so far as the city of San Francisco is concerned, it has these silver dollars ready for the banks; but between Philadelphia and San Francisco lies a large region of country where the banks and parties have hitherto had their silver dollars sent, on request, free. It has been the policy of the Government to distribute and utilize in circulation as far as possible the immense number of silver dollars that we have coined. It should be the policy now to utilize them as much as possible. It helps to build up the prosperity of the country everywhere to have these silver dollars used and in general circulation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As the gentleman is so familiar with this matter, I wish he would explain to me how we are going to send this coin by mail? We are taking away the right to send it by express, and I do not understand the physical operation of sending it by mail.

Mr. KEIFER. In the time I have I could not undertake to state how all these things have been done heretofore.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know how they have been done heretofore, but I want to know how they will be done hereafter.

Mr. KEIFER. In the law of last year we had a similar provision with reference to the transportation of silver dollars by registered mail or otherwise, and that will be the effect of this law if we strike out the word "fractional."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How is the physical act done of sending silver by mail? That is what I want to know.

Mr. KEIFER. I have not time to go into that. That is an old matter. I am anxious to say a word in favor of the more general distribution of silver dollars in the United States, if possible, than we have had in the past.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that there is a portion of our country, perhaps east of a line drawn north and south through the city of Chicago, where the silver dollar is not so much used, but east of such a line, in Ohio, Indiana, and in Kentucky, we use silver dollars. When we come here and draw our pay, they give us new paper dollars, and it is a rare thing to see a silver dollar here in circulation. Conditions are wholly different in the West and Middle West. The people demand and require the silver dollar in common circulation. If the Government does not transport it free the banks will not have it, and it will go out of circulation practically. Banks can not afford to have it expressed at their own expense. In the Eastern States they use more paper money, but in the West our people like the silver dollar for convenience, and I have every reason to believe that throughout the entire southern portion of our country the silver dollar is very popular and found to be very convenient among all classes of people.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the South we have no bills, generally, of less than $5, and the only small currency used there is silver.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no doubt that statement is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to interrupt the gentleman long enough to reenforce and emphasize the statement he has just made. It is absolutely correct. Throughout the entire southern country, and especially in the cotton belt and in the sugar belt, we can hardly get along without the silver dollars.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand, Mr. Chairman, from the statements of gentlemen and otherwise, that the silver dollar is the only good dollar that is in circulation in that country.

Mr. BURGESS. I am in hearty sympathy with the object which the gentleman wishes to attain, but I believe that his amendment does not go far enough. It would strike out the fractional silver and leave no provision for the transportation of that. Would it not be better, instead of striking out the word "fractional," to add the word "dollars," thereby securing the free transportation of silver dollars and fractional silver also?

[The time of Mr. KEIFER having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, it was extended ten minutes.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, answering the last suggestion, it is probable that there is something in it, because the language of the law last year was this:

For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver.

But if my proposed amendment is adopted, I give notice that I will make the necessary motion to correct it in the respect suggested by the gentleman. If my present motion is determined favorably, the balance of it can easily be adjusted. The first question to be determined is whether it is the sense of this committee or of the House that silver dollars shall be transported free by the Government on request of banks or other parties throughout the country, as has been the custom in past years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state what his amendment is? I did not catch it.

Mr. KEIFER. To strike out the word "fractional" in line 22, page 24, of the bill. That is all there is of it now. Last year we made an appropriation of $120,000 to transport silver coin, including fractional silver coin. This bill only provides for $75,000, but that is a matter that can be attended to later.

I am anxious to have the committee understand that this is a question of great interest. We have some of us steadily opposed the free coinage of silver, but some of us have also been in favor of the coinage of silver and the introduction of it into this country as a circulating medium. We should not have voted for it if it was to be cribbed up and kept where it was convenient only to a very small portion of our people, and they of that section of our country opposed to the coinage and use of silver.

I voted in 1878 for the bill that authorized the coinage of most of the silver coin we have now in existence. I voted for the bill against the veto of a Republican President. I have never regretted that. I am not now going to abandon these silver dollars. I want the common people, the laborers, the people in the shops, to have access to them, as many of them as they can possibly use.

The silver dollar is also valuable in the respect that it is clean money. We have a great deal of dirty paper money that comes to us out West, soiled by much handling, and it will be worse in the future, and we shall have to legislate to have more small paper currency if we do not continue to provide for the distribution of silver dollars as in former years. Our cities, like Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, and Toledo, in Ohio, all want silver and they now use it largely, as do the common people throughout our State. All our great business centers need and want the silver dollar in their business. They do not want to transport it at their expense, and be at a disadvantage as against banks and parties otherwise and more favorably located. And when you go farther west of these cities, even out in the mining regions of the Rocky Mountains, where they dig the silver out of the earth and send it back to Philadelphia to have it coined, it ought to be sent to them so that they can use it in their business. Why, as this bill provides, transport fractional silver and minor coinage, notes, bonds, and currency at the Government expense? It is of equal importance to transport free our silver dollars. I appeal to the House to do now only what has been the practice in past years. It never was needed more than now. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a word. A few weeks ago, in some bill that was under consideration here at this session, Congress struck out a deficiency appropriation to defray the expense of transporting silver dollars to the bankers and people of the country.

Mr. KEIFER. We did not strike out the provision. The House simply refused to put it in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Inside of ten days after that bill became law I received letters from nearly every banker in my district, which is composed of Davidson County, where the city of Nashville is located, and the counties of Cheatham, Montgomery, Robertson, and Stewart, protesting against the failure to make this usual appropriation. I want to say that I suppose that nine-tenths of those bankers in those counties voted against me in 1896; but if a vote could be taken to-day, tenninths of them would vote for me. [Applause.]

But I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this unwise elimination of this small appropriation is weighing heavily not only upon the bankers, but upon the farmers of the South, the tobacco growers and the cotton growers, the white and black population, who prefer to use the silver dollar. There is a magic in the "dollar of the daddies" to them all; and let me tell you that whatever affects—hurts—cotton, to move or buy it, hurts all sections of the country. In fact, we move our crop South by using the silver dollar. Now, if you want to help the negro, who is at home in the cotton patch, do not cripple the use of the old dollar.

A negro would rather have a plug hat, a red cravat, and a silver dollar and a drink than anything else on earth. [Laughter.] As a rule, up to a few years ago, the banker in our country got to be a poor Republican or a worse Democrat. Many of them voted for the lamented McKinley and against Bryan on the gold question. But they are anxious to have this appropriation reinstated because the want of it distresses their business. We are struggling for prosperity you gentlemen have in the West and in the East; and the cotton growers are struggling; white and black are struggling side by side in the field, in the factory, in the woods, and elsewhere in life's great race, and I, gentlemen, with great pleasure and sincerity, indorse the words of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], who was the friend of silver in 1878, the friend of free coinage a little before that, and who now stands here to-day speaking for the great majority of the people of the United States in this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I must disclaim that last statement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I think the gentleman has forgotten, for I looked up the record a few days ago.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Did not the gentleman from Ohio vote for the Bland Act?

Mr. KEIFER. I stated a little while ago I voted for it over a President's veto.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, the Bland Act provided for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill the fact was developed that in the transportation of silver dollars by express, where a banker in Yonkers made a request for a certain amount of silver coin, that silver was transported from New York to Binghamton, back from Binghamton to Albany, from Albany to Yonkers, and four express companies were paid for carrying that coin, whereas if it was sent directly from the subtreasury, a small distance would have to be traversed in the transportation, at but one express charge.

The development of that information led the members of the Appropriations Committee to the conclusion that no appropriation whatever should be made for the transportation of silver coin. If the bankers of the country require paper money, they make a request on the subtreasuries of the country for the amount they need, and they are obliged to pay the cost of the transportation. Why should silver be put in a different position from any other currency of the country? The fact of the matter is that the bankers frequently make application for silver dollars with which to pay the obligations they owe other people, because they can get silver transported free, and then they dump a cargo of silver on some unsuspecting creditor, and force him to accept it, and he is obliged to pay for the shipment of that silver coin back to the subtreasury. It seems to me that there ought not to be under any condition of circumstances an appropriation made for the transportation of this character of coin any more than there is for the transportation of any other money of the country.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of more moment than members of this great committee think, and with all respect to these gentlemen, I do not think the reason they give for abandoning the wise practice is sufficient. It strikes me as rather remarkable that a great committee like this should say that because here and there some bankers are standing in with the express companies and shipping forward and backward and beating the Government that therefore we will abandon the whole thing. It seems to me that that is rather remarkable.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman, if he were a member of the Committee on Appropriations what he would consider it his duty to do in respect to this appropriation in view of the action of the House at this session of Congress, which emphatically rejected the proposition of continuing the free transportation of silver dollars?

Mr. BURLESON. We believe that that action of the House was wrong.

Mr. TAWNEY. The committee had to respect the action of the House as the sense of the House, which was taken, and overwhelmingly in favor of abandoning the free transportation of silver.

Mr. BURGESS. I would suggest, in reply to the gentleman, that that is no answer to the merits of the question. The real question is, Will any wise business purpose be subserved by continuing the appropriation? That is the real question.

Now, the facts are these: Every man with a wink of sense, regardless of his view on the money question—whether he was for or against the free coinage of silver—will concede that many men do not like to take any considerable amount of silver in payment of any check or debt, and that it rather has to be nurtured and fostered in order to get silver dollars in circulation in any considerable amount. Now, we have the coin in the Treasury, and if we can get it out among the people, in circulation, undoubtedly the country will be benefited and the Treasury will be relieved. Speaking for Texas, I know what I am talking about. We have in the fall there something like 3,000,000 bales of cotton picked out in four or five months. The Mexican laborer and the negro laborer, who largely do the picking, are shy of paper dollars. They look upon them with suspicion. The negro and the Mexican know a silver dollar when they see it, and that is what they want.

Now, the landlord, the man who raises the crop, goes to the banker and says: "I must have so much in silver dollars and so much fractional silver to pay off my laborers," and the banker must in some way get it. The question is, Would it not be better to continue this practice and keep these dollars in circulation than it would be to abandon it upon the flimsy excuse that here and there in rare instances some express company is skinning the Government a little bit? Would it not be easy to change the verbiage and vest discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury, so that that kind of thing could not happen, and let the good results follow? We have been continuing from year to year this appropriation. It is just a simple business question. It does not cost very much, and I think it does a very great deal of good to the whole country in a way. I get letters from my constituents, as does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. I received them after the action was taken by the House to which the chairman has alluded. Bankers from all over my district write me respecting it, and my colleagues tell me the same, that they receive similar letters, all taking exactly the same position. It will not do to say that these men are urging this appropriation in order to benefit any express company, because they do not care one single cent about that feature of the matter at all. The bankers believe that their customers will be benefited, and therefore they ask for its continuance.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few weeks ago the bankers of my State met in convention and passed very strong resolutions in favor of the Government resuming the practice of sending silver coin to the banks. This appropriation is necessary in order to put the bankers of the country on an equality. Those banks that are located where there are subtreasuries can go to the subtreasuries and get their silver coin. The Government can not have a subtreasury in every community. We should so adjust the finances of the country as to give the bankers in the interior the same advantages that bankers at and near the subtreasuries have.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is anything that the gentleman has said not equally applicable to the duty of the Government, then, to forward all kinds of currency that it exchanges to the people all over the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps when we reach that question we will discuss it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is there any distinction, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. JOHNSON. We are now discussing the silver question, and you have a provision in this bill to transport the silver of smaller denominations than $1. On what principle did you put that in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Well, we will cheerfully tell the gentleman when we come to that question and when we come to argue the matter before the committee. Will the gentleman tell me any reason why the Government, making gratuitous exchange of money with the citizen, should, wishing to exchange some kind of money for another and giving it gratuitously, bear the expense of that transaction with reference to the silver dollar more than with other kinds of money?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated that those bankers located in the neighborhood of subtreasuries can get this exchange without expense, and while the Government can not put subtreasuries in every community, it can transport the coin and put the bankers on an equality.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Would the gentleman pardon me——

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Very well, I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman if it is not agreeable, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the country in which I live we rarely see a one-dollar or a two-dollar bill. For all transactions under $5 we use fractional silver or the silver dollar. The people are used to it and it is necessary in the transaction of our business. All that we ask is that the Government shall treat these bankers in the interior where this coin is needed just as they treat the bankers who are more fortunately situated in reference to the subtreasuries. If it is right to transport the minor coin, why not the dollars?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration a joint resolution to supply deficiencies in an appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings, and had directed him to report the same with a recommendation that it do pass; also that said committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption and passage of the joint resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAWNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 17686) making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, and ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and request a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FOSS, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, and Mr. MEYER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD pages 1361, 1362, 1363, and part of 1364 of the hearings for the Appropriations Committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, being a statement in the form of a letter by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock. I do this because in view of the remarks of yesterday the Secretary believes that his defense should be spread upon the records. I must add, however, that the committee read this letter over carefully and that it did not change its opinion of the illegality of the Secretary's procedure by reason of anything contained in that letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 16, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to the statement made by me on the 10th instant, before your committee, relative to the fund derived from the sale of town lots in the towns of Hobart, Lawton, and Anadarko, in the Territory of Oklahoma, under the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 1093–1094), some additional matters have occurred to my mind in connection therewith that I desire to bring to your attention.

The sale of said town lots was but an incident to the opening of the Kiowa and Comanche lands in the Territory of Oklahoma that occurred in 1901. Hon. W. A. Richards, then Assistant Commissioner, now Commissioner of the General Land Office, was placed in charge of that opening; and the plan and regulations relating to said opening were prepared in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General of this Department, and given the personal supervision of that officer.

The act providing for the sale of said lots was a distinct departure from any legislation with which the Interior Department had ever had to do. It was as stated by one of the members of your committee sui generis. It provided for the creation of counties and establishment of their boundaries, and for the creation of county seats in each of said counties, and the survey, subdivision, and sale of the town lots in said county seats. It placed duties upon the Secretary of the Interior such as had never before been placed upon that officer. It provided that the proceeds from the sale of said lots, after the expenses of survey, subdivision, and sale had been paid therefrom, should be disposed of under his direction for the purpose of building bridges and roads, a courthouse, and such other public improvements as the Secretary of the Interior might deem advisable; and it provided that he should pay the expenses actually necessary to the maintenance of the county governments in each of said counties until such time as the local taxes provided a sufficient revenue for that purpose.

Plenty of acts had been passed by Congress prior to this one, making an appropriation of moneys, the disposition and expenditure of which was placed under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Interior, but they were for funds already in the Treasury. A number of special acts had been passed authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain portions of the public land at public auction, but the sales as a rule were for the purpose of obtaining revenue for the General Government, and the proceeds thereof went into the hands of the receiver of public moneys at the respective local land offices in the usual way, and thence into the Treasury.

Some idea may be gathered as to the idea of Congress in the matter by a glance at the proceedings while the bill (H. R. 12901) was pending before it. In the report of the House committee (56th Cong., 2d sess., Rept. No. 2274) the following statement is found in regard to this feature of the bill:

"An entirely new method is provided for disposing of the town lots. Heretofore, whenever town sites have been reserved, they have been opened to occupancy to anyone who, in the mad rush for possession, was able to settle upon it first. This method has always led to opportunities for violations of law, blackmail, threats, and in many cases compelled intruding settlers in the towns to equip themselves with six-shooters and Winchesters; in fact, in many cases the settler who could equip himself as a walking arsenal usually obtained possession of choice lots and was not interfered with.

"This bill provides that all the lots in the county-seat towns shall be sold at public auction and the proceeds applied to erecting a courthouse, costing not to exceed $10,000, and the balance of the money is to be used in making roads, erecting bridges, and for such other purposes as may be deemed necessary. It is expected that in no case will the receipts from the sales of these county-seat lots be less than $100,000 for each county seat. This fund will pay all the expenses of the county and equip its government with all facilities and prove a godsend to those who may settle in either the town or county.

"In the past every county in Oklahoma had a debt represented by county warrants of from $50,000 to $100,000 before the people elected their own county officials. Under this bill no indebtedness can be contracted, unless approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in any county prior to the election by the people of their own officials at the next general election. The bill further provides that the necessary officers, made necessary by the laws of Oklahoma, shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Also, in the debate on the bill in the House, February 18, 1901, on which day it passed that body under suspension of the rules, Mr. LACEY, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in explaining this feature of the bill to the House, made this statement:

"The bill provides that the proceeds of the sales of the town lots shall go into the county fund for the building of bridges and courthouses. This is a great improvement over the previous laws under which other parts of Oklahoma have been opened." (The emphasis is mine.)

And again he said:

"The allotments are to the Indians, and the balance will be opened under the homestead law; but if the town lots are taken without any compensation the result would be that individuals would get the benefit of the unearned increment, whatever it may be. Under this amendment they will be sold and the value of the town lots will go to the counties to be used for county purposes."

In view of the report of the House Committee on Public Lands above quoted (there was no discussion in the Senate) showing how the proceeds from the sale of these lots would enrich the counties affected thereby, and the statements of Mr. LACEY that the proceeds were to go into the county fund, I beg to submit to you, was it not reasonable to conclude that Congress passed this bill with the understanding that none of these proceeds were to be deposited in the Treasury, but were to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, as trustee, for the immediate benefit of the counties affected thereby? This is item No. 1.

On July 19, 1901, instructions were prepared by the Assistant Attorney-General for the signature of the Acting Secretary, which were addressed to Mr. Richards, advising him as to the manner of his procedure in the sale of said town lots.

Those instructions, among other things, directed Mr. Richards to deposit the proceeds from the sale of said lots in the United States subtreasury at St. Louis to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior as trustee for the various town sites.

The deposits were made in that way, but on August 10, 1901, a deposit having been made or tendered by Mr. E. P. Holcombe, townsite trustee for the town of Hobart, the assistant treasurer of the United States at St. Louis, being in doubt as to his authority to accept the deposit in that way, wrote the Secretary of the Treasury, on or about that date, in regard to the matter, with the result that on August 12, 1901, the Secretary of the Treasury wired the assistant treasurer at St. Louis to accept the deposit. The evidence of this will be found in certain correspondence addressed to Mr. E. P. Holcombe, left by me with your committee, and is important, in that it shows that the Secretary of the Treasury not only knew the manner in which the moneys were deposited, but directed that such deposits be received. This is item No. 2.

The funds having been deposited in the manner above stated, and with the knowledge if not by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is apparent that they could be checked out only or disbursed only by the official check of the Secretary of the Interior; and if that was a proper deposit, then the propriety of all the following procedure must follow as a matter of course, for the entire control of the matter was thereby put in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, who was answerable to no one for the manner of his procedure, except the authority that created the trust he was executing, namely, the Congress of the United States. This is item No. 3.

On January 22, 1902, the Acting Secretary of the Interior, Judge Ryan, addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have the honor to request that this Department be furnished with a book of 500 checks on the United States assistant treasurer, St. Louis, Mo., for use of the Secretary of the Interior in the disbursement of the fund derived from the respective sales of town lots in Oklahoma, as provided in the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat., 1093–1094).

Respectfully, THOS. RYAN, Acting Secretary.

In response to that request the Secretary of the Treasury furnished a check book, and has since furnished other check books of a similar character, upon a similar request, for the same purpose. This is deemed important, in connection with the other items above set forth, as showing that the Treasury Department, from the beginning, had knowledge, not only of the manner in which the deposit of the proceeds from the sale of said town lots was made, but was given notice of the manner in which it was proposed to disburse said proceeds, and that it offered no objection or criticism thereto, and hence must, in all justice, be held to have acquiesced therein. This is item No. 4.

In connection with the four items above mentioned, your attention is called to the fact that every month, as I am advised, the assistant treasurer at St. Louis in transmitting his monthly report or accounting to the Treasury Department transmits, among other things, the checks that have been drawn by the Secretary of the Interior upon said townsite funds. These checks, from the beginning, were notice to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the manner in which those funds were being disbursed, and no notice has ever come from that Department to the Interior Department that there was any irregularity in the procedure, or that anything was ever done that should not be done—a further evidence, in my judgment, that the Treasury Department must be held as having notice of and acquiesced in the procedure of this Department in the disbursement of said fund. This is item No. 5.

In December of 1904 a committee, appointed one by the Auditor for the Interior Department and one by the Comptroller of the Treasury, examined the vouchers on file in this Department, and not only found no irregularities of moment in connection with said disbursements, but, on the contrary, you will find the following statement in the body of their report:

"The vouchers were generally in proper form as evidence of payment and of that for which payment was made; the purposes for which expenditures were made being within the statutes providing for the expenditures. The vouchers for salaries and allowances of county officers and other expenses for county government bear the approval of the county commissioners and governor of the Territory of Oklahoma, and indicate the close scrutiny of the latter, his approval in many cases being for a reduced amount, which in all cases was followed in the payment of vouchers."

A copy of that report, dated January 23, 1905, was transmitted under cover of a letter to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, without comment or criticism, and without any suggestion that the course that had been pursued by the Interior Department in the disbursement of this fund was in any way irregular. Another item, if you please, which justified this Department in believing that the Treasury Department concurred in the course it was pursuing in this matter. This is item No. 6.

Something was said by one of the members of your committee on the question of publicity; and in this connection I desire to say that the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior every year since these disbursements began has contained a full and complete report of the condition of said fund, showing the amount of money received, the amount disbursed, and the purposes for which disbursed, and the amount remaining on hand in each portion of the fund. This matter has not been done in a corner. There has been no effort to conceal anything, but every effort has been made to give it the widest publicity consistent with proper administration. This is item No. 7.

Something was also said by one of the members of the committee by way of a comparison between the town-lot act and the reclamation act.

In reply to that I desire to say that a comparison between the two acts at the time these questions were presented was impossible, for the reason that the reclamation act was not passed until fifteen months after the town-lot act became a law, and, as stated, there was no precedent of any similar law for the guidance of the Department.

The construction which the assistant attorney-general for this Department seems to have put upon the act appears to have been that it created a trust which the Secretary of the Interior, and he alone, was required by the law to execute. It is upon that theory, apparently, that the funds were deposited in the manner stated, and that theory has been followed since in the administration of the act, and I am by no means convinced that it is not the correct one. The act provides that the proceeds from the sale of said lots shall, after certain preliminary expenses are paid therefrom, "be disposed of under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the following manner;" then follows the purposes for which said expenditures are to be made. There seems to be no uncertainty or ambiguity about that language, which justifies, apparently, the theory on which this Department has proceeded.

Something was also said by your committee—that a trustee must make a showing or accounting. That is true; to the power that creates the trust and him; and this trustee is ready to make a showing or report at any time to the power that created him as such trustee, to the Congress of the United States, to your committee, or to any other body or individual authorized by law to receive it.

Every dollar of this fund that has been disbursed has been legitimately expended for the purposes contemplated by the act and none other, and the claims submitted have been carefully and conscientiously audited, the more so, perhaps, because of the nature of the trust. I can within a very brief time furnish your committee, if required to do so, an itemized statement of every penny expended, and I can in fifteen minutes show the exact condition of the fund.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

EXTENDING PROVISIONS OF ACT OF MARCH 3, 1901, TO CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17663.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17663) to extend the provisions of the act of March 3, 1901, to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps advanced at any time under the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle.

Be it enacted, etc., That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps advanced in rank for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism, and who since such advancement have been or may hereafter be promoted, shall from the date of the passage of this act be carried as additional numbers of each grade in which they serve.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this is and who it affects.

Mr. MEYER. I will state, Mr. Speaker, at present it affects about two officers directly in the Marine Corps, and who have received additional numbers by reason of conspicuous conduct in battle in the Philippines and in China.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman from Louisiana speak a little louder? We can not hear a word.

Mr. MEYER. In pursuance of the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 of the Revised Statutes, and in recognition of "eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism" during the Spanish war, a number of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps were advanced upon the navy list. Such advance, while intended merely to benefit the officers so advanced, incidentally worked hardship upon the officers who, while perhaps equally patriotic and competent, had been assigned to duty under circumstances affording no opportunity to achieve especial distinction, and who consequently found themselves, after the war, in lower relative places on the naval list than they would have occupied if the war had not occurred.

Such promotions for special gallantry were therefore made at the expense not of the Government, but of the unfortunate officers over whose heads others were promoted. To remedy these conditions a clause was inserted in the act making appropriations for the naval service approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat., 1108), as follows:

That the advancement in rank of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, whensoever made, for services rendered during the war with Spain, pursuant, respectively, to the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 of the Revised Statutes, shall not interfere with the regular promotion of officers otherwise entitled to promotion; but officers so advanced by reason of war service shall, after they are promoted to higher grades, be carried thereafter as additional to the numbers of each grade to which they may at any time be promoted; and each such officer shall hereafter be promoted in due course contemporaneously with and to take rank next after the officer immediately above him, and all advancements made by reason of war service shall be appropriately so designated upon the navy list: Provided, however, That no promotion shall be made to fill a vacancy occasioned by the promotion, retirement, death, resignation, or dismissal of any officer who at the time of such promotion, retirement, death, resignation, or dismissal is an additional member of his grade under the foregoing provisions.

This provision is, however, limited in its application to services rendered "during the war with Spain." Certain officers of the Navy and Marine Corps have been advanced for gallantry in action in the Philippines and in China since the close of the Spanish war, and with respect to these officers and others on the lists below them the objectionable conditions above set forth now exist. If the remedy provided by the act of March 3, 1901, above quoted, was desirable in the case of advancements made for services during the war with Spain, it would appear to be equally appropriate whensoever like advancements are made. Upon this subject the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in a report dated January 27, 1906, says:

As the matter now stands, the advancements of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps which have been made for service other than in the war with Spain are entirely at the expense of the officers who have lost numbers by reason of these advancements, and it appears to the Bureau that the reward for one officer should not be made at the expense of another. Officers who did not have an opportunity to earn an advancement certainly should not suffer the loss of promotion to which they would otherwise be entitled but for the advancement over them of other officers.

The Bureau recommends that Congress be asked to enact legislation providing that all officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who have been or may be advanced under the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 of the Revised Statutes shall, after they are promoted to a higher grade, be thereafter additional to the number of the grade to which they may at any time be promoted.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, has received the recommendation of the Navy Department and a unanimous report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear the gentleman over here. I would like to ask the gentleman a question—If this bill is not to correct promotions which were made on account of services in the Spanish-American war or services in the Philippines of some officers or members of this Marine Corps?

Mr. MEYER. It applies to officers who have received promotion by extra numbers for conspicuous gallantry in the war with China and the war in the Philippines. Such legislation has been enacted in favor of officers who gained distinction in the Spanish-American war, but does not apply to similar cases in the wars with China and in the Philippines.

Mr. PAYNE. Then this extends the same privileges and rights in reference to promotion to men who rendered conspicuous service in the war in the Philippines and in China as has already been extended by law to men promoted for the same character of service in the Spanish war.

Mr. MEYER. Yes. Really it does not give any advantage or additional favor to the officers thus promoted, but is in justice to the officers over whom they were promoted. It provides them as extra numbers.

Mr. MANN. This does not refer to any war in the future.

Mr. MEYER. It provides that officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, advanced in rank for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism, and who since such advancement have been or may hereafter be promoted, shall be carried as additional numbers of each grade in which they serve.

Mr. PADGETT. I would like the gentleman to state who declared the war with China.

Mr. MEYER. Wars are frequently engaged in without any declaration of war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of Dr. William K. Knowles, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the postal laws relative to newspaper subscriptions; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of Mount Hope Lodge, No. 475, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Fall River, Mass., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLINT. In behalf of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], who is absent from the Chamber by reason of illness, I present sundry telegrams against the pass amendment to the rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. FLINT (for Mr. NIXON) presented memorials of Local Trainmen's Lodge No. 313, of Winnemucca; Local Division No. 158, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Sparks; Local Lodge No. 7026, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Tonopah, and Local Division No. 94, Order of Railway Conductors, of Winnemucca, all in the State of Nevada, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of sundry property owners and residents of Georgia avenue, Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to change the name of Georgia avenue to Arsenal avenue; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRAZIER. I present about 700 telegrams received from citizens of Tennessee, protesting against the adoption of an amendment to the railroad rate bill denying to railroads the right to issue passes to railroad employees and their families. The telegrams were addressed to me personally, but I present them as being in the nature of memorials, and ask that they lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be received.

Mr. FRAZIER presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Nashville, Crossville, Jackson, Humboldt, Trenton, Harriman, Memphis, Jonesboro, Lafollette, Fayettesville, Shelbysville, Rockwood, Dayton, Graysville, Oakdale, Chattanooga, Cleveland, Emory Gap, Lexington Depot, Bolivar, Tullahoma, Franklin, Clarksville, Evansville, Athens, and Knoxville, all in the State of Tennessee, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STONE. I present sundry telegrams, in the nature of memorials, from citizens of Kansas City, Quitman, Plattsburg, Rockport, Clearmont, St. Joseph, Ravenwood, and South St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called "meat-inspection section" in the agricultural appropriation bill, requiring packers to pay for inspection. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Montana presented the memorial of W. J. Brown, secretary of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Great Falls, Mont., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DANIEL presented petitions of the Baptist Conference of Richmond; of the congregation of the Broad Street Methodist Church, of Richmond; of the Methodist Preachers' Meeting of Richmond; of the East Hanover Presbytery, of Richmond; of the Young Men's Christian Association of Richmond, and of 200 citizens of Norfolk, all in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the closing on Sunday of the Jamestown Exposition; which were referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions.

He also presented the petition of Mary A. Fairfax, of Washington, D. C., praying that she be reimbursed for damages sustained by the establishment of a school near her property in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAPP presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of Virginia, Detroit, Melrose, East Grand Forks, Winona, St. Paul, and Minneapolis, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" prohibiting the issuance of free passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURROWS presented memorial of Local Lodge No. 568, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Alpena, Mich., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLATT presented memorials of sundry railroad employees of New York, remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" to prohibit the issuance of passes to railroad employees and their families; which were ordered to lie on the table.

STATISTICS RELATING TO PASSENGER RATES.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that some statistics which I have received, being a comparison between passenger rates in this country and the countries of Europe, and which I intended to introduce during the discussion of the rate bill and omitted, may be printed in the RECORD and also as a document. They are very valuable statistics prepared by Mr. H. T. Newcomb, who was one of the witnesses before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: I regret very much that the difficulty and delay incident to obtaining the necessary data have precluded an earlier fulfillment of my promise of December 19, 1905, to furnish you with tables showing comparisons between passenger charges on European railways and those in force for similar distances in the United States.

I now submit the promised tables. You will observe that I have followed your suggestion, that a comparison not unfair to the European railways can be made by setting against the first-class fares in force abroad the first-class fares charged in this country plus the Pullman fares. This conclusion seems to be justifiable. Perhaps, however, it will not do to say that it is always fair to American railways. On this basis the question of relative quality of service is left out of sight, although, if allowance could be made for it, it would render the showing still more gratifying to good Americans. This is especially true when the comparison is between ordinary first-class fares in Europe and the first-class fares in this country for a night journey plus the sleeping-car fares. The traveler in Europe obtains for his first-class fare the privilege of wrapping himself in a rug and of reclining as he can on the seats of his compartment; certainly obtaining a much smaller degree of comfort than if he had a berth in an American sleeping car.

In the following table I have compared the fares for distances from 51 to 392 miles, using the first-class fares for European journeys and adding to the first-class fares in this country the rates for a seat in a Pullman parlor car. You will observe that in all cases the points of departure and destination are given, together with the mileage, and for this country the railway and Pullman fares are stated separately, the totals also being given.

Where sleeping cars are available in Europe, the rates are still higher and vastly exceed those via the American railways. The following table shows the charges from Paris to the destinations named via the Oriental express in comparison with rates for similar distances in the United States. The charges in both cases include a berth in a sleeping car:

If there is anything further that I can do for you in this connection, please let me know.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. T. NEWCOMB.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17455) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River at or near the village of Clearwater, Wright County, Minn., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to hear the provisos read.

The Secretary preceeded to read as requested.

Mr. BURROWS. That is sufficient.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH Y. PORTER.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5365) to appoint Joseph Y. Porter a lieutenant-colonel and assistant surgeon and to place him on the retired list of the Army, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs were, in line 6, before the word "surgeon," to strike out the word "assistant" and insert the word "deputy," and after the word "surgeon" to insert the word "general;" after the word "Army," in line 7, to insert the words "without pay," and at the end of the bill to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance either heretofore or hereafter shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Joseph Y. Porter, late a captain and assistant surgeon of the United States Army, to the position of lieutenant-colonel and deputy surgeon-general, and to place him on the retired list of the Army without pay as of that rank, and the retired list is hereby increased for that purpose only: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance, either heretofore or hereafter, shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to appoint Joseph Y. Porter a lieutenant-colonel and deputy surgeon-general, and to place him on the retired list of the Army."

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

WHARVES AND PIERS IN LAKE MICHIGAN.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 162) authorizing the construction and maintenance of wharves, piers, and other structures in Lake Michigan adjoining certain lands in Lake County, Ind., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution just reported by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the demand for the regular order, but will insist on it after the joint resolution is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANNEL IN MISSISSIPPI SOUND.

Mr. CLAY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 166) providing for payment for dredging the channel and anchorage basin between Ship Island Harbor and Gulfport, Miss., and for other purposes, to report it favorably without amendment. I desire to call the attention of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] to this report.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I hope that no objection will be made to it, because I can not stay here very long and I want to get it passed.

Mr. LODGE. What is the bill?

Mr. MONEY. It is a report from the Committee on Commerce nationalizing a port.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17983) providing for the erection of a monument on Kings Mountain Battle Ground commemorative of the great victory gained there during the war of the American Revolution on October 7, 1780, by the American forces, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2476) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to regulate the business of employment agents and employment agencies; and

A bill (S. 6097) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 6394) to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16785) giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTUS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5830) providing for the taking of testimony in cases at law or in equity now pending or hereafter to be brought in the circuit courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2527) to confirm and legalize prior admissions to citizenship of the United States where the judge or clerk of the court administering the oath to the applicant or his witnesses has failed to sign or seal the record, oath, or the judgment of admission, and to establish a proper record of such citizenship, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4267) to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors near the Government Hospital for the Insane and the District almshouse, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6234) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, of Montana, to construct a bridge across the Missouri River in Lewis and Clarke County, Mont.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the morning business closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not closed. Reports of standing and select committees are in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order if morning business has not closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SMOOT introduced a bill (S. 6395) for the exchange of certain lands situated in the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, and other considerations, for lands adjacent thereto, between Le Grand Young and the Government of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 6396) granting an increase of pension to Mahlon N. Brisack; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 6397) for the relief of the estate of Jean Cheri Verneuil, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAYNER introduced a bill (S. 6398) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Omstead; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRAZIER introduced a bill (S. 6399) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at the city of Chattanooga, State of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6400) for the relief of the Hiwassee Masonic Lodge, No. 188, of Calhoun, Tenn.; and

A bill (S. 6401) for the relief of the estate of Walker W. Winstead, deceased.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 6402) for the relief of Amanda Casey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 6403) for the relief of George Ivers, administrator de bonis non of William Ivers, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. OVERMAN introduced a bill (S. 6404) for the relief of the estate of Peter H. Knight; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (S. 6405) for the opening of Macomb street NW., District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 6406) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept donations of money and land for the establishment of a branch library in the District of Columbia, to establish a commission to supervise the erection of a branch library building in said District, and to provide for the suitable maintenance of said branch (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6407) to remove dirt, gravel, sand, and other obstructions from the paved sidewalks and alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 6408) granting a pension to Mary Louise McLean; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KITTREDGE introduced a bill (S. 6409) to grant an extension of certain letters patent to Louie J. Harris; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a bill (S. 6410) granting an increase of pension to Marcus A. Biggerstaff; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6411) granting an increase of pension to Z. T. Elkin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6412) to correct the military record of W. R. Flanery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 6413) granting a pension to Eugenia Sinclair; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON. I submit an amendment relative to the number of third lieutenants in commission in the Revenue-Cutter Service and also in relation to the chief engineer of the Revenue-Cutter Service, which I intend to propose to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask that the amendment be printed, together with the accompanying memorandum to be printed at the foot of the amendment, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CLARK of Montana submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for improvements for the present Federal building at Butte, Mont., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ASSISTANT CUSTODIANS AND JANITORS OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the emergency measure which has come from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 170) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for assistant custodians and janitors of public buildings was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services in connection with the care of public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the joint resolution be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS GARRATT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 18236) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Garratt, returned from the House in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, and that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17663. An act to extend the provisions of the act of March 3, 1901, to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps advanced at any time under the provisions of sections 1506 and 1605 for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ELIZA SWORDS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1160) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Swords, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

P. J. McCUMBER,
N. B. SCOTT,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. A. CALDERHEAD,
JOHN C. CHANEY,
LINCOLN DIXON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 4:

S. 584. An act for the relief of David H. Moffat.

On June 6:

S. 5561. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia,'" approved February 5, 1901.

On June 8:

S. 1243. An act providing for compulsory education in the District of Columbia.

FISHING IN ALASKAN WATERS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 267) to prohibit aliens from fishing in the waters of Alaska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In the second line of the language proposed to be inserted, after the word "has," strike out the word "not;" in the third line of the language proposed, after the word "is," insert the word "not;" at the end of section 1 strike out the words "canneries, salteries, etc.," and insert the words "or with the canning, salting, or otherwise preserving of fish;" and the House agree to the same.

WM. P. FRYE,
H. C. LODGE,
A. O. BACON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LLEWELLYN POWERS,
EDWIN W. HIGGINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FULTON. I wish the Senator who has this matter in charge would explain just what change is made by the conference report.

Mr. LODGE. It is a mere verbal change. It makes no change in the bill at all, but simply corrects the wording. The wording of the bill as passed by the House was not quite correct.

The report was agreed to.

PROPOSED ISLE OF PINES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The present order is concurrent and other resolutions. Are there concurrent or other resolutions?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate resolution 103.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama calls up Senate resolution 103, proposing the appointment of a committee to make a careful examination into the condition of the people of the Isle of Pines, etc.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN March 22, 1906, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Chair, with instructions to make diligent and careful examination into the condition of the people of the Isle of Pines before and since the enactment of the law known as the "Platt amendment" to the Army appropriation bill, approved the 2d day of March, 1901, and up to the time of the execution of this order and their report thereon.

Such inquiry shall include the form of the so-called "government de facto" in said island, its officers, and by whom appointed, and the manner in which such government has been conducted by those who claim or have claimed to be in authority there since the Army of the United States was withdrawn from the island of Cuba and the government of that island was turned over to the Congress and people of Cuba.

The committee shall inquire and report whether under such government in the Isle of Pines any official abuses or oppressions have occurred with reference to the people of that island affecting their liberties, their persons, or their schools, their churches, their sepultures, their taxation, their employment or vocation, their property of any description, their intercourse and trade on the island, or with other ports or places, or with shipping engaged in the trade of the island.

They will inquire and report in respect of any alleged judicial proceedings, civil or criminal, conducted or entertained by any judge, magistrate, or alcalde acting under the laws of Cuba, against any of the inhabitants of the Isle of Pines, resulting in their imprisonment or amercement in fines or forfeitures, and of the places at which such trials were had, and as to the removal of such defendants, by force or compulsion, to any place in the island of Cuba to answer such accusations or prosecutions. And also whether the alleged judicial officers so employed in such proceedings were appointed by the Government of Cuba or of any department thereof.

Said committee will further inquire and report as to the number of American citizens that were residing in the Isle of Pines at the time when the Government of Cuba was turned over to the Congress and people of the Republic of Cuba and before that time, and when the immigration of such citizens into said island first begun.

They will further ascertain and report as to the progress of such immigration, and the classes of people who settled in the island as seekers and builders of permanent homes or places of residence, and the number of such citizens who now reside in the Isle of Pines as permanent settlers; and also what increase or decrease of population and of what citizenship, respectively, has taken place in that island since the evacuation of Cuba by the Army of the United States.

The committee will also examine into the conditions of the island as to agriculture, fruit growing, and the extent to which the immigrants from the United States are landowners and cultivators, and whether their crops, orchards, and farm productions, such as cattle, hogs, and poultry, are becoming productive and prosperous.

They will also give descriptions of the topography of the island, its waters and water courses, and its coasts, bays, inlets, and harbors, with reference to navigation; and its roads and bridges and by whom constructed and paid for; its forests and their value; the healthfulness of the island, and the character and conduct of the citizens of the United States who reside there, and, generally, any facts that will inform the Senate as to all material facts concerning the duty of the Government toward the safeguarding, protection, and regulation and control of its citizens who inhabit the Isle of Pines.

2. Said committee is empowered to visit the Isle of Pines, or to designate a subcommittee to visit the same, and to send for persons and papers. Oaths to witnesses may be administered by any member of the committee or subcommittee.

3. The committee is empowered to appoint a secretary, a stenographer, a typewriter, and a sergeant-at-arms, and to pay them their compensation at the rate prescribed by law.

The necessary allowances for travel and board of the committee and its officers and for attendance and the mileage and attendance of witnesses shall be paid on proper vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The committee may sit during the sessions of the Senate or during its vacations and at any place in the United States or in the Isle of Pines.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I was stating the facts, on Friday of last week, on which this resolution is based, the Senate kindly offered me permission to conclude my remarks, setting aside the regular order for that purpose. I was physically unable to avail myself of that indulgence, and the resolution has gone over until to-day. I thank the Senate for its further indulgence.

I feel it to be my public duty to complete my statement of the grievances of the citizens of the United States who are living in the Isle of Pines. They have not been listened to by the other departments of the Government, though they have been pressed with differential respect and importunity, but with the firmness that injured people are wont to express their complaints for serious wrongs done them, especially to the President of the United States.

They demand their constitutional right of petition, but not on bended knees or with timorous breath.

I am here presenting their petition to the Senate for a hearing, simply, before action is taken on a treaty that gives their property to Cuba, together with their homes; that places their socail, political, and religious rights under the control of a Government that despises them and subjects them to abuse by people who, in their exercise of illegitimate and brutal power, repeat the story of the viper that, being warmed into life and saved from destruction by the kindly assistance of the woodman, turned upon him and stung his children to death at his fireside.

I am not on the floor only to endeavor to defeat that treaty. That is not necessary, in my judgment, for I believe it has never had the votes requisite to its ratification, and it should never have had such support in the Senate.

Will it not be considered by my fellow-Senators as a strange statement if I should declare that I dread the consequences of the rejection of this unfortunate treaty upon the peace and safety of Cuba and upon the peace and welfare of the people of the United States? When the treaty is defeated, then the Isle of Pines must confront the greater peril of the unrestrained antagonism of the Secretary of State. This has been declared, and that announcement must have been intended to seal the fate of our people in that island.

Presently I will explain the causes of these apprehensions, when I have read some further statements showing the great changes that have occurred in the Isle of Pines since that treaty was negotiated, on the 2d of March, 1904, more than two years ago, and since the enactment of the Platt amendment on May 2, 1901, more than five years ago.

This treaty proposes some recognition of the rights of American citizens in the Isle of Pines, as follows:

ART. III. Citizens of the United States of America who, at the time of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, shall be residing or holding property in the Isle of Pines shall suffer no diminution of the rights and privileges which they have acquired prior to the date of exchange of ratifications of this treaty; they may remain there or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners.

That our people "shall suffer no diminution of the rights and privileges which they have acquired previous to the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty" means that the Cuban Government will not permit them to acquire any of those rights and privileges that belong to ordinary Christian civilization while the treaty is pending except the bare right to own lands and some other descriptions of property in the Isle of Pines. Unless they are permitted by the de facto government to acquire and enjoy some other rights and privileges it is vain that the treaty should declare that they should "suffer no diminution" when it is ratified.

All the time since this treaty was negotiated and since Cuba had partial autonomy under the Platt amendment, she has exercised the full governing power in the Isle of Pines. This has been done under an interpretation made by General Wood, on the 20th of February, 1903, of an agreement with Cuba dated May 20, 1902. While that interpretation is of no validity and is manifestly a perversion of the agreement of May 20, 1902, still it has been made to serve the purpose of putting Cuba in possession of all the powers of civil and military government in the Isle of Pines up to the present time. Since General Wood's postfactum interpretation was given to that agreement in February, 1903, Cuba has exercised greater power in the Isle of Pines than she has ever attempted to exercise in any department of the alleged mother island of Cuba.

I will defer for a moment to present what Cuba has actually done under these extraordinary powers to prevent American citizens from acquiring or enjoying the "rights and privileges" that are to "suffer no diminution" if this treaty is ratified, and will examine the extract from the agreement of May 20, 1902, which General Wood has changed by his marvelous and unauthorized interpretation given a year later.

That extract is as follows:

It is understood by the United States that the present government of the Isle of Pines will continue as a de facto government pending the settlement of the title to the said island by treaty, pursuant to the Cuban constitution and the act of Congress of the United States approved March 2, 1902.

This agreement was made on May 20, 1902, after the Cuban constitution was adopted, after Cuba had elected a Congress, and after all was prepared for the accouchment that should give it the breath of life. This agreement was the accoucheur that brought it into active existence. It antedated Cuba's first infantile scream of life and liberty.

Cuba was not "the present government" when that document was executed. It was the expected government, which that document was intended to inaugurate. There was no present government to be "continued" in the hands of Cuba, as a de facto government. It was the military government of the United States that was to be continued. Cubans had no military government anywhere except under the command of the United States, and they had no civil government except as a convenience to enable the sovereign—the Governmnt of the United States—to rule them and the Spaniards and other foreigners on the island of Cuba. "The present government" that was continued in the Isle of Pines by that agreement of May 20, 1902, was the military government of the United States, to continue until Congress should otherwise provide. It was not intended that the military government of Cuba or its civil government should exist in the Isle of Pines as a de facto government. To make this more definite and certain, it was further provided in the agreement of May 20, 1902, that the "present government" should continue "pursuant to the Cuban constitution and the act of Congress approved March 2, 1902"—the Platt amendment—both of which excluded the Isle of Pines from the constitutional limits of Cuba.

The Platt amendment of March 2, 1902, which is the only law of the United States that related to the Isle of Pines on the 20th of February, 1903, or before or since that time, does not provide for a government de facto in the Isle of Pines. No law of Congress, or even of Cuba, has ever provided for any such government. It was a pure military invention, based upon no pretense of right, authority, or power, unless it might be upon some fancy of the Secretary of War or of General Wood that, because Cuba had been under the military domination of the United States, one or both of them could institute a government for the Isle of Pines and ordain it to continue as a de facto government until the question of title to the Isle of Pines could be settled by treaty with the United States. This was presumptuous usurpation by the military authorities.

Usurpation of military power could scarcely be more audacious than this adventure. Yet that interpretation by General Wood, a year later, of an agreement made May 20, 1902, is the sole foundation of all the difficulties and outrages that the Cuban authorities have inflicted upon citizens of the United States since the government of the Isle of Pines was thus surrendered to them. General Wood, in the "indorsement" he made on the Senate resolution of February 16, 1903, says:

The action taken by the military government was in accordance with telegraphic orders from the honorable Secretary of War.

It will behoove the committee, if the Senate should adopt the pending resolution, to ascertain the authority of the Secretary of War to create a de facto government in the Isle of Pines and place it under Cuban dominion. Perhaps the committee can also discover the origin, in law, of a de facto government created at the expense of the de jure government, that no act of war, or of usurpation, and no treaty had displaced or put in abeyance. There must be a foundation or authority for such unheard-of enterprises before the United States can be thus deprived of its sovereign supremacy wherever its flag floats by a military secretary or the order of a brigadier-general.

Now, Mr. President, I will return to what this Cuban military government de facto has been doing with our citizens in the Isle of Pines since it was lifted into its terrible authority by the interpretation of Gen. Leonard Wood, announced from the office of late military commander of Cuba in Washington. He is cited in the report of the majority of the committee as authority, even after his powers had ceased and he was functus officio. His "interpretation" came at a queer date, according to accusations made by intelligent and credible men who have suffered heavily under his officious utterances.

I will refer to this accusation farther on. I desire again to state that I am discussing this resolution with reluctance, and only because I believe it is necessary to prevent serious conditions in Cuba. I have again asked the Senators who oppose it and prefer not to kill it outright by a vote, if they have that power, but to turn it over to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it will be asphyxiated, that they would consent to its passage without a division. They decline to accept any peace overtures. They insist that the questions in the case are all questions of law, and not of fact; questions of duty, and not of conditions. They insist that if the people are to suffer they are to be blamed for rashly trying to live and thrive on the soil of the United States, and under its flag, when the President desires to give up that soil, and the people with it, to Spanish voracity in Cuba. If only law questions are concerned in this matter, are the people to be censured because they can not decide such questions offhand and against their honest right, while the Senate had not been able to decide either the law or the facts against them after more than two years' incubation?

In that time, and before that time, these worthy people have suffered much, and they ask the Senate to find some remedy for their troubles, or at least that, in pity, they will investigate the causes of their distress. The President turns away and refuses to hear them through their chosen delegate bearing their petition. The people who sent that delegate were as worthy, as intelligent, and as patriotic as any average community in America, and the delegate, Mr. Pearcy, is personally the peer, in the judgment of his acquaintances, who are numbered by thousands, of the President.

He turns Mr. Pearcy over to Mr. Secretary Root, who has recently written the following letter, which prejudges and predetermines the entire question, as well for the people as for the Senate:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 27, 1905.

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of October 25, in which you say: "Kindly advise me at your very earliest convenience the necessary procedure to establish a Territorial form of government for the Isle of Pines, West Indies, United States of America."

It is no part of the duty of the Secretary of State to give advice upon such subjects. I think it proper, however, to answer your inquiry so far as it may be necessary to remove an error under which you appear to rest concerning the status of the Isle of Pines and your rights as residents of that island.

There is no procedure by which you and your associates can lawfully establish a Territorial government in that island. The island is lawfully subject to the control and government of the Republic of Cuba, and you and your associates are bound to render obedience to the laws of that country so long as you remain on the island. If you fail in that obedience, you will be justly liable to prosecution in the Cuban courts and to such punishment as may be provided by the laws of Cuba for such offenses as you commit. You are not likely to have any greater power in the future. The treaty now pending before the Senate, if approved by that body, will relinquish all claim of the United States to the Isle of Pines. In my judgment the United States has no substantial claim to the Isle of Pines. The treaty merely accords to Cuba what is hers in accordance with the international law and justice.

At the time of the treaty of peace which ended the war between the United States and Spain the Isle of Pines was and had been for several centuries a part of Cuba. I have no doubt whatever that it continues to be a part of Cuba, and that it is not and never has been territory of the United States. This is the view with which President Roosevelt authorized the pending treaty, and Mr. Hay signed it, and I expect to urge its confirmation. Nor would the rejection of the pending treaty put an end to the control of Cuba over the island. A treaty directly contrary to the one now pending would be necessary to do that, and there is not the slightest prospect of such a treaty being made. You may be quite sure that Cuba will never consent to give up the Isle of Pines and that the United States will never try to compel her to give it up against her will.

Very respectfully, ELIHU ROOT.

CHARLES REYNARD, Esq.,
President of American Club of the Isle of Pines, West Indies.

Mr. Charles Reynard, to whom Mr. Root's letter is addressed, replied to it on December 14. Mr. President, as the reply is somewhat lengthy, and it has been printed in the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I will ask leave to insert it in the RECORD without taking up the time of the Senate or exhausting my own strength in reading it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission will be granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

SANTA ROSALIE HEIGHTS,
Isle of Pines, West Indies, December 14, 1905.

SIR: On December 4 I replied briefly by cable to the letter of November 27, with which you favored me in reply to mine of October 25. I have since then carefully considered your letter, together with the members of the American Club and others of our fellow-citizens interested, and in their behalf, as well as for myself, I respectfully invite your attention to the following statement:

You say in your letter, "The Isle of Pines is lawfully subject to the control and government of the Republic of Cuba." This we emphatically deny. We regret that you did not see fit to give some reason for the bold and unsupported statement which you make. We beg to submit the following reasons in support of our denial of that statement.

The Republic of Cuba exists solely by virtue of the Cuban constitution. That constitution was adopted, ratified, promulgated, and put in force by the sole authority of the United States. Beyond the scope of that constitution the Cuban Republic has no powers whatever. By the terms of that constitution itself the Isle of Pines is expressly excluded from the constitutional boundaries of Cuba. Until that constitutional limitation is removed and until, by some of the known, recognized, and lawful methods by which a sovereign state may acquire an extension of its territory, the Isle of Pines becomes incorporated in the Republic of Cuba, the Government of that Republic can no more exercise lawful control over it than over Key West or the peninsula of Florida itself.

Further, by that section of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1901, which is commonly called the "Platt amendment," the Isle of Pines was expressly excluded from Cuban territory. The act of Congress is still in full force. Until its provisions respecting Cuba are repealed or modified by the Congress of the United States or in some other lawful way they have the force of law, and the Government of the United States and every officer and Department of that Government is bound by them, personal opinions of any Government officials, however high in station, to the contrary notwithstanding.

We maintain, therefore, that in usurping and continuing to exercise any measure of political control over the Isle of Pines up to this day the Cuban Government has acted unlawfully and in violation of the plain provisions of the Cuban constitution. And we maintain further that the Government of the United States and any officers of that Government who have knowingly consented to or connived at such usurpation on the part of the Cuban Government have acted unlawfully and in violation of the plain provisions of the act of Congress of the United States referred to.

In your letter of November 27 you state further: "You and your associates are bound to render obedience to the laws of that country (Cuba) so long as you remain in the Isle of Pines. If you fail in that obedience, you will be justly liable to prosecution in the Cuban courts and to such punishment as may be provided by the laws of Cuba for such offenses as you commit." This, we submit, is only an erroneous conclusion on your part from the untenable statement previously quoted from your letter. We are unable to conceive how the laws of Cuba can be in force in a territory in which the constitution of Cuba, by its own terms, is not in force and to which Cuban authority has never been extended by conquest or treaty. We must decline to acknowledge the duty of obedience to the laws of an alien country while we are within a territory from which such alien jurisdiction has been expressly excluded by the laws of our own country.

Your letter states also:

"In my judgment, the United States has no substantial claim to the Isle of Pines. * * * I have no doubt whatever that it continues to be a part of Cuba and that it is not and never has been territory of the United States."

We regret sincerely that your opinion as to the validity of the American claim to the Isle of Pines should be so directly opposed not only to our own, but to the opinions expressed on the same subject by the late President McKinley, by your distinguished predecessor in office—Secretary Hay—and by the late military governor of Cuba, Gen. Leonard Wood. That President McKinley did believe that the island was ceded by Spain to the United States is easily shown by his action in directing the dispatch of an official communication from the War Department, dated August 14, 1899, in which occur these words: "This island was ceded by Spain to the United States, and is therefore a part of our territory, although it is attached at present to the division of Cuba for governmental purposes * * * and * * * the disposition of public lands must await the action of Congress." This very explicit statement was made more than six months after the treaty of Paris had been ratified by the Senate of the United States, and therefore after there had been ample time for reaching a sound conclusion as to the meaning and effect of the terms by which, in the treaty, the extent of the cession of territory made by Spain was to be distinguished from the relinquishment of sovereignty which applied solely to Cuba.

President McKinley, acting on the same conclusion, directed that the Isle of Pines be placed as American territory on the great maps issued by the Government of the United States, which show all the territory belonging to the United States. This action was public notice to all the world that the United States Government not only had a substantial claim to the Isle of Pines, but that no doubt was entertained of the validity of that claim. Moreover, the late Secretary Hay clearly and openly expressed his opinion, based on the same considerations, doubtless, which had led President McKinely to form his conclusion, that the island was and should remain an American possession. And, finally, General Wood, only a few days before the termination of the American occupation of Cuba, openly expressed the same opinion, and gave emphatic assurances to some of the American citizens interested that the American control of the island would be continued after the island of Cuba had been delivered to the Cuban Government. It will not surprise you, therefore, if we decline to accept your brief and unsupported conclusion above quoted, but prefer to adhere to the conclusions reached by Secretary Hay and General Wood, the reasons for which have repeatedly been published, making it unnecessary to repeat them here.

Further, we are informed and believe that you yourself, when Secretary of War, acting on the advice or recommendation of the legal adviser of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, directed the military governor of Cuba, on or about May 16, 1902, in view of the inauguration of the Cuban Government then about to occur, to take steps to continue the then existing government in the Isle of Pines as a de facto government, pending the settlement, by treaty, of any question as to the title to or jurisdiction over that island. Such a course indicated an intention to respect and comply with the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1901, above referred to, and to provide for the continuation of the American control of the island until a final decision of any pending questions could be lawfully reached. In his address delivered to the President of the Cuban Republic on the occasion of the institution of the Cuban Government, on May 20, 1902, the military governor announced to the Cuban Government that the existing government in the Isle of Pines would be so continued—that is, that the American authority in the island would continue—pending the negotiation of a treaty covering the question in dispute, but he failed entirely to take any steps whatever to carry out the intention so announced. By this failure and neglect alone, and for no other cause that can be imagined, the Cuban Government inaugurated on that day was permitted to assume control over the Isle of Pines, in violation of the express terms of the constitution, by which it derived its right to exist, and in total disregard of the act of Congress which permitted it to come into existence. That control so usurped has continued to be exercised from that day to this without our recognition of its validity and in spite of our repeated protests against it. It is much to be regretted that in your letter to me or in any public utterance of yours you have not seen fit to explain to your fellow-citizens what instructions were given by you, as Secretary of War, on this point, and why any instructions that may have been given looking to the fulfillment of the provisions of the act of Congress were permitted by you to be disregarded, and why no steps were taken by you or your successor to correct the deplorable results of such apparent neglect and disobedience on the part of your subordinate.

It is further observed by us that it was not until after this breach of duty and violation of law had resulted in the betrayal of our interests to an alien government you, as Secretary of War, in opposition to the known and expressed wishes of Mr. John Hay, then Secretary of State, insisted on the negotiation of the treaty, which has never been confirmed, by which the American claim to the Isle of Pines was sought to be abandoned in favor of the Cuban Republic, thus covering up and concealing by the sanction of law the illegal acts and omissions of the Department of the Government over which you presided at the time and for which you were responsible.

Your letter further states: "You may be quite sure that Cuba will never consent to give up the Isle of Pines, and that the United States will never try to compel her to give it up against her will."

With the first part of that statement, considered as a prediction, we are not concerned. We are prepared to maintain and are maintaining that Cuba is not lawfully or rightfully in possession of the island. We know that one Department, at least, of our Government at Washington has refused to recognize and has, in fact, distinctly repudiated the claim of Cuba to the island as a part of her territory. We are confident of our ability, if a hearing is granted to us, to demonstrate the absolute correctness of our position on this question, and we have enough confidence in the sense of justice and law-abiding character of our fellow-citizens of the United States and of the greater part of our own Government to feel sure that, once that demonstration has been made, they will never consent to the deliberate abandonment of a part of the national territory and a number of their fellow-citizens to an alien power, and that means will easily be found by which the United States will resume the control of the island, unlawfully abandoned by you, with or without the consent of any foreign power whatever.

You also state that "the rejection of the pending treaty would not put an end to the control of Cuba over the island. A treaty directly contrary to the one now pending would be necessary to do that." From such a statement we emphatically dissent. The pending treaty has for its motive and its purpose the consummation of a wrong which is at present incomplete. The rejection of the treaty by the Senate of the United States or by the Congress of the United States would put an end to further attempts in that direction and would leave the status of the Isle of Pines exactly what it was before the attempt to betray us was conceived. That status would be determined by the law of the United States, to say nothing of the constitution of Cuba. It is the sworn duty of the President of the United States to enforce the law relating to the Isle of Pines as faithfully as he enforces the laws against any form of robbery. To accept your dictum on this point is to acknowledge that a treaty with a foreign power is required to undo a wrong against American citizens, but frustrated by them.

You lay stress on the statement that "the Isle of Pines was and has been for several centuries a part of Cuba." Geographically the island is not a part of Cuba. Politically it was a part of the Spanish dominions, just as Porto Rico and the Philippines were. Administratively it has recently been a part of the Spanish Government of Cuba, just as the districts of east and west Florida were long a part of the same district government. But, granting all that you mean by the statement last quoted, it does not follow that the Isle of Pines was included in the territory over which Spain relinquished her sovereignty by the treaty of Paris rather than in the territory which was ceded by that treaty to the United States. The right of Spain to cede it was as good as her right to relinquish it, whether it was or was not a part of Cuba, politically, geographically, or administratively. The only question worth considering in this connection is whether Spain intended to and did cede the island to the United States, and whether the United States accepted the cession in its favor, or whether the island was included in the relinquishment made by Spain in favor of a Cuban State to be erected by the United States.

That the Spanish commissioners who assisted in the negotiation of the treaty and in the drawing of the instrument believed that they were consenting, on behalf of their country, to a cession of territory, which included the Isle of Pines, to the United States is apparent from the language employed by them in an appendix to protocol No. 9, presented to the American commissioners at the meeting held on October 21, 1898, which, as officially published by the United States, says that the United States "did claim sovereignty over * * * the islands surrounding Cuba, which will render impossible the independence of the latter without the good will and gracious consent of the United States, which will always have it at their mercy, through their control over the islands which inclose it as a band of iron." The Isle of Pines nowhere approaches the Cuban coast within 50 miles. There can be no doubt that the Spanish commissioners at Paris intended and believed that they were ceding the island to the United States. The American commissioners never expressed any dissent from the statement of the Spaniards on this point. Nor can there be any doubt that President McKinley, who dictated or approved every provision of the treaty, so understood and interpreted it. The official declaration of the War Department, of August 13, 1899, the action of the Interior Department with respect to the official maps of the United States territories, above referred to, neither of which could have been possible without the order or approval of President McKinley, sustain the same view.

The more recent action of the Treasury Department, in refusing to concede to the products of the Isle of Pines exported to the United States the reduction of duties granted to Cuban products under the provisions of the reciprocity treaty with Cuba, was based expressly on the ground that by act of Congress the Isle of Pines was not Cuban territory and the Department must be governed by that act until it should be repealed or lawfully nullified. In fact, not a single Department of the Government of the United States has ever recognized the Cuban claim to the island except the Department of State. And it is a very striking fact that the State Department itself never expressed any doubt on the subject until after the island had been allowed, by the neglect or disobedience of a military subordinate, to fall into Cuban hands, after which the Department was confronted by the alternative of acknowledging and correcting the wrong then committed or of condoning and concealing it by the negotiation of such a treaty as is now awaiting the action of the Senate.

We regret sincerely that in your letter of November 27 you saw fit to limit yourself to a bare statement of what you profess to consider as facts, certain conclusions which you profess to draw from such facts, and predictions as to what will or will not happen in the future. It may be that you do not consider it within the scope of your duty as Secretary of State to impart to your fellow-citizens the reasons for your conclusions any more than to give to your countrymen the advice which I respectfully solicited from you in my former letter. In the total absence of any such reasons in support of your position we prefer to stand by the conclusions reached by President McKinley, Secretary Hay, and Secretary Shaw, the reasons for which are stated above only in part, and which are diametrically opposite to yours.

To resume, then, we maintain that the Isle of Pines is and has been, ever since the confirmation of the treaty of Paris, American territory; that the Cuban Government has not and never has had any lawful right to exercise any control whatever in or over that territory; that such control as has been usurped and exercised by that Government is based on a breach of duty by a subordinate American officer and is in violation of the law of the United States and the Cuban constitution itself; that we have not attempted and will not attempt to deprive the Republic of Cuba of any of its lawful possessions by secession, insurrection, or revolution, and that we have no other end in view than the defense of American territory and of our interests lawfully acquired in it, and of our birthright as American citizens. In this effort we feel that we should be entitled to receive your support in the discharge of your sworn duty; to our astonishment and deep regret we find you arrayed on the side of our enemies. And even more deeply do we regret the appearance, for the first time in the history of our country, of an American Secretary of State who is not only willing but anxious to abandon a portion of American territory and a large number of American citizens to an alien and lawless government for no consideration and for motives which he seems unwilling to disclose.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES REYNARD,
President American Club of the Isle of Pines,
West Indies, United States of America.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, on the issues of fact and law joined between them, I am convinced that Mr. Reynard has answered Mr. Root triumphantly.

As a Senator entitled to consider and vote on this subject, I challenge and resent Mr. Secretary Root's ex cathedra enunciation of the fixed policy of the United States on this question of our relations with Cuba. If he finds such outgivings compatible with his supposed relations to the Senate as Secretary of State, and if he finds Senators who agree with him in such decretal orders to the people and Government of the United States, and who sustain his arrogant assumption of power by their votes in this body, I can only express my dissent with becoming respect to the sovereign State and people of Alabama, who sent me here to express, without fear, their earnest demand that treaties shall be made by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, and not by a Secretary of State, and that international rights shall be open to inquiry, despite his opinions.

If Secretary Root believes that Cuba has always owned the Isle of Pines and still owns it, and that she will never cede it to the United States, the most embittered Spanish Royalist in Cuba could not state the right of Cuba with more dogmatic assertion. So believing, he is not even impartial in this great controversy, and is disqualified from deciding it, ex cathedra or otherwise. Certainly he is not qualified to be the guardian of State for Americans in the Isle of Pines, who are honestly claiming their rights thus arbitrarily overruled by the Secretary of State.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT (handing a paper to Mr. MORGAN). I ask the Senator from Alabama if, in his opinion, that is a correct quotation?

Mr. MORGAN (examining). I see it is an "Extract from treaty of Paris." Then there are some inquiries stated here.

Mr. SCOTT. Are not those inquiries a correct statement of the case?

Mr. MORGAN. I will read what the Senator from West Virginia has called my attention to:

[Extract from treaty of Paris.]

ART. II. Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies.

Following that are these queries:

PERTINENT QUERIES.

Is the Isle of Pines an island? Is it in the West Indies? Was it, at the time of the signing of the treaty of Paris, under Spanish sovereignty?

Those questions must necessarily be answered affirmatively. They are a perfect analysis of the leading question in dispute.

Mr. President, the decision so announced by the Secretary of State accounts for the indifference of that Department to the appeals of our people who are now locked in Cuban prisons, under illegal convictions of crimes of which they are not guilty, and are making humble appeals to the Senate for relief and redress.

An important inquiry involved in this imbroglio with Cuba, in which our people are left to their self-protection, or, to state the fact more accurately, are refused any assistance or intervention by the Executive of the United States, is the commerce and commercial rights of the people of the island with Cuba and with other countries. This external commerce and travel can only be conducted by vessels, as the island is 60 miles from Cuba, and several hundred miles from the great commercial ports of the United States. It has no land connections with other countries.

In controlling such transportation by water between such ports and places, and also between points on the Isle of Pines, the Cuban Government has resorted to such arbitrary and unjust measures that Americans there are being robbed and maltreated in a way that brings our Government under just censure for its refusal to assist them in asserting their rights, even under the laws of nations.

In addition to the sworn statement of Mr. Pearcy, in the RECORD of Friday, June 1, on this subject, I will now read the following letter which shows a decision of our Government that the Isle of Pines is not Cuban territory within the meaning of the treaty of reciprocity with that Government:

NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, W. I.,
December 18, 1905.

Maj. J. E. RUNCIE, Habana, Cuba.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the barrel of honey shipped from the Isle of Pines to Mobile by S. H. Pearcy, will say that the writer arrived at Mobile December 22, 1904, and it was only a few days later that I went to the custom-house to pay the duty on same. At the time that I paid this duty I was given the 20 per cent reduction in accordance with the reciprocity treaty with Cuba. The next day I was sent for to come to the custom-house, where I was informed by the official in charge, Mr. Callahan, that in looking into the matter he had found a decision, rendered him from Washington, which stated that the Isle of Pines was not Cuban territory; therefore could not give me the benefit of the reciprocity of that country. Consequently I had to refund the 20 per cent given me previously under this clause.

A copy of this decision rendered from Washington upon which Mr. Callahan based his action was obtained by Mr. Ed. J. Pearcy and sent to Mr. J. A. Hill at New York, to file with his claim before the Supreme Court.

Yours, respectfully, DRIVER FULLTON.

Here is a decision upon the question by our own custom-house authorities, free from the interpretation of Gen. Leonard Wood, that under the treaty of Paris and under the Platt amendment the Isle of Pines was not a part of Cuba, but was a part of the United States, and was therefore not included within the privileges of our treaty of reciprocity with Cuba. This decision is, doubtless, correct, and it shows that the Leonard Wood interpretation of the agreement of May 20, 1904, is wholly at fault in placing the Isle of Pines within the jurisdictional limits of Cuba in spite of the Cuban constitution that expressly excludes it therefrom. If General Wood's military order was ever intended to continue "the present government" of Cuba over the Isle of Pines, which government did not then exist, it did not take that peculiar flavor of interpretation until the tobacco fields of Pinar del Rio were found to be in competition with better tobacco fields in the American Island of Pines. This new condition needs to be examined. It has not been examined and will not be, if it can be further concealed.

I will here remark, Mr. President, that the minister from Cuba, whom I respect very highly and for whose opinions and statements I have the greatest possible deference, has printed a pamphlet and circulated it amongst Senators, and I suppose throughout the United States, in which he makes a disquisition on the laws of nations, making extracts from certain standard authorities. He also enters into a long enumeration of maps, reaching back to the earliest possible dates and coming down to this time—an enumeration and consideration of perhaps fifty maps; I do not know how many there are—to support the conclusion that the Isle of Pines was always geographically, and under the governmental establishment, a part of the island of Cuba. They are undoubtedly maps which, during that same period of time, were issued by very eminent geographers. But why are we paying any attention to that, when it was one of the terms and conditions of the Platt amendment that Cuba should in her constitution change all this geography and meet this occult claim that the Isle of Pines had always been a part of Cuba by saying that she shall exclude it from her constitutional limits? The constitution of Cuba consequently excluded it expressly from her constitutional limits; the Platt amendment expressly excluded it from the constitutional limits of Cuba; and everything excluded it until we get down to that agreement of March 2—I believe it is—1903; and then claimed that it is not only included within the constitutional limits of Cuba, but that a government de facto is established by that agreement on the Isle of Pines; and the American flag, which was floating there, was hauled down and the Cuban flag put up; and it seems to have been understood that this government de facto is to be supplied with its officials and its powers of every kind by the Government of Cuba. I deny the fact and also the interpretation of that alleged agreement.

Mr. President, that change in the geography of Cuba, by which the Isle of Pines was excluded from her constitutional limits and set apart as separate territory, as I have observed, was forced upon Cuba by the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States demanded that Cuba should do that before we would give her the breath of life, that she did not have, and she did not have a national entity until we gave it to her by our agreement. She was ours essentially. We made a great mistake in not going further and taking her and dealing with her as she ought to have been dealt with. If we had done so, we should have got rid of a great deal of trouble between this Government and that, and very much more trouble that is now brewing and threatening the peace of the whole country. But the Platt amendment forced Cuba to change her geography by constitutional delimitation, excluding the Isle of Pines from her jurisdiction. I should think that Mr. Quesada's quotation of maps would become ineffectual in the presence of such a constitutional provision as that. If Cuba and the United States, agreeing together, can not change that geography so as to make the Isle of Pines a separate place, a separate piece of property and subject to a separate jurisdiction from that of Cuba, maps have a very much greater authority than I ever supposed they had. They fix the boundaries of nations, it appears, that even constitutions can not change. That is the situation.

Mr. President, there is much talk about Cuba having always owned the Isle of Pines. She never owned a foot of it. There is much talk about Cuba. She never was in possession of a foot of it, as a government or in any other right. But, granting that it was always in the legal jurisdiction of Cuba, granting all that they claim on that subject, it still turns out that, in order to get a title to the land set apart in her own constitution, she agreed that the Isle of Pines should be excluded from it. Does not that break up this mythical geographical idea and geographical definition, and are Senators justified logically in recurring to these definitions in support of a theory, when there stands the constitution of Cuba and the Platt amendment and the subsequent agreements, all of them declaring that the Isle of Pines is excluded—that is the word used—from the territory of Cuba?

We made there, Mr. President, a political delimitation which Cuba can not surmount until she changes her constitution. She can not thus disregard it without our consent, because Cuba, after all, has never been erected, even up to this day, into a free, sovereign, and independent government. That is all a mistake; it is a fallacy that is leading some very wise men into error. No, sir; Cuba is vassal; the United States is sovereign, to a very large extent, and is suzerain over that Government. There are many things stated in her constitution which she consents that she will not do without the consent of the United States. I need not quote them now.

After this matter had taken place, during Mr. McKinley's Administration, Gen. BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner of the General Land Office, by the direction, as he stated on the floor of the House, of the President of the United States, began printing maps of the territory of the United States relating to their insular possessions. He has printed four in successive years, and I have got them here. One of them hangs in this Chamber, so that Senators may read it, which shows the Isle of Pines, separated from the island of Cuba, geographically, by 60 miles of water, is marked "United States possession."

I hope Senators will examine these maps.

These maps are circulated throughout the United States in large numbers. There is no part of the publications of the Government of the United States which the people more eagerly apply for and get into their houses than the maps published by the authority of the Government. Every Senator here knows that. We have sent out hundreds and hundreds of maps for the purpose of informing our people of the geography of their country. Four annual series of them went out to the people of the United States with the Isle of Pines marked on them as the property of the United States. What better evidence does a common man want as to the ownership of the Isle of Pines when he can look up to the walls of his cottage and see hanging there an official map printed by authority of the United States on which the Isle of Pines is described as a part of the territory of the United States? But that had to be reversed. There were influences at work in Pinar del Rio. There was a tobacco trust in Pinar del Rio, and they had to reverse that situation, and they did reverse it.

Mr. President, these things ought to be inquired into by the Senate of the United States. We have not got the facts before us on the oaths of men—we have got their letters, we have got some sworn affidavits that I put in the RECORD here; but we have not, by any means, touched the very sore spot in this whole business, which is that the tobacco trust in Cuba has been attempting, and is now attempting, with might and main to drive these people from their homes that they have bought upon an island that was marked on the map of the United States as being under the Government and flag of this country.

I wish now to speak, Mr. President, about our commercial relations to the Isle of Pines, and to call attention to the fact that the Cuban Government has traveled far beyond the Platt amendment and her own constitution, and, basing her pretensions upon the idea that she has absolute sovereignty and autonomy, is dealing with the people and property of the United States engaged in commerce in a way that violates the law of nations and the laws of the United States.

When the steamer Cristobal was built by the owners as an American vessel for the Cuban trade, the Cuban Government determined to capture it by applying the old Spanish coasting-trade laws to its flag and its ownership. It placed the Leonard Wood de facto grapple upon it, and was, almost literally, invited by the United States Government to reject any pretensions of the right of the United States to own or govern the Isle of Pines.

I have here a letter from Mr. T. J. Keenan, addressed to me, under date of February 19, 1906, which I will ask the Secretary to favor me by reading, as I have not very much strength to waste. It is a very interesting and very important letter, and Mr. Keenan is a strong, able, powerful man, and is not a man to be frowned down even by the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE OF PRESS CLUBS,
Pittsburg, Pa., February 19, 1906.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Two thousand Americans who have purchased present or future homes on the Isle of Pines owe you heartfelt thanks for your efforts to prevent the ruin and expatriation which would follow the consummation of the iniquitous Isle of Pines treaty. Following Secretary Root's assurance to Cuban Minister Quesada that the treaty would be forced through the Senate at the present session, the Cuban Government has already adopted a policy of reaction and repression toward the American colony on the island. The superficial concessions which were granted at the instance of former United States Minister Squiers, in an earlier effort to secure the approval of the treaty, are being withdrawn or nullified one by one. Even the enactments of the military government, which, under the terms of the agreement by which the Cuban Republic was established, have the force of law and can only be repealed by Congressional legislation, are deliberately set aside by executive orders from members of the Cuban cabinet, and, notwithstanding the heavy reenforcement of rural guards which has recently been sent to the island to overawe the Americans, a series of dastardly outrages has been perpetrated upon American settlers. Domestic animals have been poisoned or maimed, and the homes of Americans have been soaked with kerosene and set on fire, the occupants barely escaping with their lives. None of the perpetrators of these outrages have been apprehended, nor does there seem to be any effort on the part of the Cuban authorities to apprehend them. A Cuban judge of first instance, who was sent to the island some two years ago and who was deservedly popular with the Americans because of his efficient administration of justice and of his ability to understand their language and comprehend their rights has been recalled, and has been succeeded by a judge who can not speak a word of English, and who is utterly unacquainted with the people of the Isle of Pines.

As four-fifths of the island are owned by Americans, and Americans have an interest in nearly every judicial proceeding, it can be readily imagined what kind of justice the new magistrate will dispense. The port of entry which has been established at Neuva Gerona serves little purpose, through the failure to secure a bonded carrier for the transportation of goods across Cuba, and the custom revenues of the island continue to be collected at Habana and to be turned into the Cuban treasury direct without either benefit or credit to the Isle of Pines. These consular duties would naturally constitute the bulk of the insular revenues, yet we are calmly informed by the Cuban Government that the taxes paid on the Isle of Pines do not justify them in expending anything for the improvement of the highways or the maintenance of other public works. When the Cuban Congress appropriated $2,000,000 for Cuban roads two years ago, Minister Squiers asked the director of public works how much of this sum was to be expended on the Isle of Pines. "Not one cent," was the curt response. Minister Squiers himself is my authority for this statement. Doctor Thomas, a prominent American resident of the Isle of Pines, who was formerly dentist to the King of Spain, was told by a Cuban official that it was the design of his Government to remove the leper hospital from Habana to the Isle of Pines as soon as the United States surrendered the latter territory. While the natives of tropical countries have come to regard with complacency the presence of lepers in their midst, I need hardly tell you that the location of a hospital for these incurables in the heart of an American colony would be as fatal to that colony as a yearly visitation of the bubonic plague. The very name of leper is terrifying to a resident of the United States.

With such glimpses of the cloven foot already revealed, what may be expected when the American colony is abandoned to the tender mercies of the Cuban Government? The reverses of war may have excused the abandonment of the Acadians by France, but what reason can the Government of the United States give for the expatriation of a colony of its own citizens fostered by its own official assurances that they should remain forever under the protection of the American flag? Through nearly four years of agitation over the ownership of the Isle of Pines, culminating in a deliberate attempt to vest in a foreign government the title to a territory almost as large as that of the smallest American State, not a single representative has been sent by our Government to investigate upon the ground the facts involved in the controversy. General Wood barely set foot upon it in one of his yachting trips when he was military governor of Cuba. Secretary Root refused to accept an invitation to visit it when he was in Habana, although the island was then in his official charge as Secretary of War. During the period that the Isle of Pines treaty has been before the Senate, we have repeatedly asked for the appointment of a committee to visit the island before the treaty was voted upon. Senator FORAKER, chairman of the sub-Foreign Relations Committee, told me that he contemplated visiting the island in person last year, but, up to date, we have waited for him in vain, although some hundred or more of his constituents who have found homes upon the island are anxious to welcome him.

Mr. FORAKER. May I interrupt the reading long enough to inquire who it is makes the statement that I ever promised to visit the Isle of Pines?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Keenan.

Mr. FORAKER. I remember seeing him. He called upon me a year, or perhaps about that long ago. I saw him in the Marble Room. He invited me very pleasantly to visit the Isle of Pines, but I never promised to visit the Isle of Pines. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. MORGAN. He does not say the Senator promised to go.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood him to say that I promised to visit the Isle of Pines, and that the people were still looking for my visit, which has not yet been made. He is under an entire misapprehension.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, as follows:

In behalf of all the Americans who are interested in the island, I again ask that a Senatorial committee be appointed to visit the Isle of Pines and investigate for themselves the condition of its affairs.

All the statements which I have made in this letter I am prepared to substantiate by ample proof, but I have a recent and startling development of Cuban policy not only toward the American colonists on the Isle of Pines, but toward the American nation itself, to which I wish to direct your special attention. Every American who has been long resident at Habana, and who has employed his faculties of observations, knows that the Government and people, notwithstanding their professions to the contrary and their gifts to members of the President's family, are not only vilely ungrateful, but vindictively hostile, toward the United States. The rice tax, the British treaty, the enforced removal of Minister Squiers are all manifestations of this unnatural resentment which a petty nation harbors for the great nation which gave it life. But a more defiant and a more dangerous move against American interests than any of those which I have named has just been made.

When the United States Government terminated the military occupation of Cuba and established the Cuban Republic it was provided that the regulations of the military government should have the force of law. Among these regulations was one giving to vessels carrying the American flag the same rights in trading between Cuban ports as are enjoyed by Cuban ships. When the steamer J. J. Campbell went from Mobile to take up the run between Batabano and the Isle of Pines the Cuban Government at first insisted that she should be compelled to change her nationality and carry the Cuban flag. Minister Squiers, however, cited the regulation to which I have referred, and the Campbell was for the time being grudgingly permitted to fly the Stars and Stripes. When Minister Squiers was recalled, the Cuban Government, relying upon the complaisancy and inexperience of his successor, and the supineness of our State Department, determined to wipe out at one stroke the special privileges enjoyed by American vessels in Cuban ports. In the refreshingly direct manner in which Latin-American countries sometimes undertake to remove international annoyances, this heavy blow at American interests was struck, without even the color of law. No effort was made to pass a repealing act through the Cuban Congress. A subsecretary of the treasury simply issued an order that the interisland trading privileges were forthwith annulled, and the owners of the Campbell were directed to secure a Cuban registry and haul down the American flag or get off the Caribbean. The immediate occasion for this remarkable order was found in the announcement that the steamer Cristobal Colon, which has just been completed at Wilmington, was about to sail for the Isle of Pines to claim the right to trade with Cuban ports under the American flag. I append a translation of correspondence with the collector of customs at Nueva Gerona and the Cuban treasury department, which speaks for itself:

"NUEVA GERONA, ISLE OF PINES, January 17, 1906.

"Mr. J. I. ANDERSON,
"Secretary of the Isle of Pines Steamship Company, City.

"DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of even date, I have the honor to send you herewith a copy of a communication received from the Secretary of the Treasury which treats of the treatment to which a foreign vessel has to be submitted which has been imported with the intention of engaging in the coasting trade.

"I think it advisable to inform you that the principal condition which has to be fulfilled before a vessel can fly the Cuban flag is that the owner must be a Cuban citizen.

"Yours, very truly,

"F. M. ARREDONDO, Custom-House Collector."

"HABANA, January 13, 1906.

"CUSTOM-HOUSE COLLECTOR, Nueva Gerona.

"DEAR SIR: Referring to your communication No. 457 of the 23d of December of last year, I have the honor to inform you that this office understands that the second paragraph of article 166, as well as part (a) of article 177 of the Cuban house ordinance, are in fact annulled, as the privileges that they granted to American vessels engaged in the Cuban coasting trade only existed during the intervention period on account of their being issued by the American Government to facilitate the occupation and control of Cuba by the United States forces and the maintenance of order during that occupation and so that with its transitory character, and it was transitory, its force would cease as soon as those forces were withdrawn and the Cuban Government was constituted, and as it was only a necessity which answered for the period of intervention.

"In the same manner and for the identical reasons the articles 2, 3, 4, 15, 17, 21, 69, 99, 113, and 234 of said ordinances have been annulled or modified.

"Whereas in case a foreign vessel is imported with the intention of engaging in the coasting trade in the territory of the Republic, the coasting trade being a privilege which is reserved in all countries for the national vessels, they must primarily change their flags according to the regulations in force so as to record their description in the corresponding lists and to pay all the custom duties and any other charges that may be due according to the regulations and laws which are actually in force, and your attention is called to the action of the royal order of the 22d of June of 1865, which treats of the change of flags; circular 276 of this office of the 5th of July of 1904 on the description list of vessels, and to the acts in the ordinances and tariff in force as far as they refer to importation duties, etc. No one would be authorized to engage in the coasting trade until he has complied with the demands of the before-mentioned regulations.

"Yours, very truly,

"GUILLO CHAPLE Y S.,
"Subsecretary of the Treasury."

As soon as the owners of the Critobal Colon received the order of the Cuban treasury department forbidding the ship to trade under the American flag they submitted the above correspondence to their attorney at Habana, and received the following response:

"MERCADERES, HABANA, January 27, 1906.

"THOMAS J. KEENAN, Esq.,
"Farmers' Bank Building, Room 2025, Pittsburg, Pa.

"DEAR SIR: Referring to the decision of the treasury department here in the matter of requiring you to register your boat under the Cuban flag, I beg to advise you that this decision is perfectly illegal, inasmuch as the regulations put in force by the American Government in the island of Cuba have the force of law and can be derogated only by a law passed in due form by the legislative power of this Republic. It is therefore not within the jurisdiction of the treasury department to revoke any disposition which has the force of a law.

"As a practical matter, I am of the opinion that you will find it best to comply with the requirements of the Cuban law as to coastwise trading. If you do not, you will get into legal difficulties which will cost you money, and, further, Congress will probably, by legislative act, provide that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade must be under the Cuban flag.

"Improving this opportunity to reiterate the assurances of my distinguished consideration, I am,

"Attentively, yours,

J. M. W. DURANT."

It is utterly impossible for the owners of the Colon to comply with the directions of the Cuban treasury department. There are no Cuban capitalists on the Isle of Pines to provide a steamer for the Cuban trade, and Cuban captains and engineers are practically unobtainable. The traffic between Cuba and the Isle of Pines is almost exclusively American, and demands the right to patronize an American ship. Aside from all these considerations, however, the fact remains that Cuban law permits the Cristobal Colon to trade under the American flag, and the owners of the vessel propose that it shall do so. The Colon will sail from Wilmington for Batabano, Cuba, on Thursday next. When she arrives at Batabano she will demand her right to run between Batabano and the Isle of Pines without changing her nationality, and if the refusal of this right is persisted in an appeal will be made to the American minister. If this appeal is ineffectual, every American vessel will be deprived of the rights guaranteed her when the Cuban Republic was formed, and the privilege of paying rent for a couple of coaling stations, one of which is admittedly worthless, will remain about the only compensation which the United States will retain from the Cuban Republic for a war of liberation which cost our country over a quarter of a billion dollars and many thousands of valuable lives.

Trusting that you will pardon the length of this letter, the excuse for which is your request that I write you fully on the subjects touched upon, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

T. J. KEENAN,
President American Society, Isle of Pines.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, a while ago I adverted to the fact that an effort was being made in Cuba—and these official orders show it was carried into effect—to capture such ships as Americans might own and build and carry there, with a view of trading between Cuban ports under their coastwise laws. The unworthy attempt which is made in that order is not based upon any act of the Cuban Congress, but upon an interpretation that they put on some old Spanish laws which they seem to insist have come over to them, whereby the owners of the Cristobal Colon—a ship that cost these gentlemen $50,000, a perfectly new ship, built for that trade—when they attempted to put it in the Isle of Pines trade, they were required, first, to put the Cuban flag upon the ship and to register it as a coastwise trading ship, which could only be done in case the ownership was transferred to Cubans. Mr. Keenan points out that there is nobody in the Isle of Pines or elsewhere in Cuba among the natives or citizens of Cuba, that he knows of, with sufficient ability to buy such a ship. So the property is absolutely lost to them unless they will consent to make some enormous sacrifices upon its value in order to get it into that trade. Of course they can not do that.

That clear, honorable American letter, bristling with facts that support a powerful appeal to the Senate for an investigation, will not be as a light hid under a bushel; it will blaze in the capital set on a hill, and will be a beacon light that the Senate can not fail to recognize and can not extinguish. These Americans are only calling for the truth, and they will have it, beyond the power of denial from any source.

I refer again to article 3 of the treaty.

The "rights and privileges" our people are to acquire, in their own country where they have their homes under the shadows of the palms and the laurels, and where their orchards and groves are blooming and ripening their golden fruits, in the only land that nature has provided for the instant union of hope and fruition, of the blossom and the harvest in the same hour, are limited, by Cuban adoption of the savage Spanish laws, to the right to exist, to labor, and to suffer. These are promised to our people by the party-colored rural guards, the fitting ministers of the Wood de facto government, after the treaty is ratified.

What our people are forbidden to acquire by the de facto scheme before the treaty is ratified is the value of the produce of tobacco fields and of the golden citrus groves, with the privilege of sending their crops by sea, free of duty, to their home ports. Cuba requires that they must be shipped only through Habana. They must not compete with Habana.

In their family relations our people are forbidden to marry, except under the ministrations of the Church of Rome. They are forbidden to hold social meetings without the permission of the judge. If they are sick, they must have a Cuban doctor, and, dying in the absence of such a forced intruder, they must be examined post-mortem by a public autopsy. They can not have burial in a Protestant, unsanctified cemetery. If they have mail matter going or coming, no one is responsible if it is not delivered or is robbed.

In their schools Spanish must be taught by Cubans or Spaniards, and revolting atrocities of speech and conduct by their teachers is regarded by them as an amusing recreation.

They are spied upon, browbeaten, and threatened by gangs of rural guards, most of them negroes, and are arrested without information under oath or warrants and shut up in jails that are unfit for the confinement of beasts. Then bonds are required if they are admitted to bail, but the bond means so many dollars in cash. This is the reserved fund of villainous oppression, and is being constantly replenished by such forced contributions.

As to taxes, they are multiplied and compounded until they often destroy all business enterprises.

These are only some of the blessings that are to be secured to our people by article 3 of this treaty, and they will still continue in full force when the treaty is ratified. I have not stated some of these blessings of Cuban rule that acquired and are to be secured to our people by article 3 of this treaty when it is ratified. They will not bear mention in the Senate.

The testimony set forth in the reports of the committee is not all under oath. Neither in the Committee of Foreign Relations, nor in the Department of State, nor at the executive department, have any of these Americans been heard in person, nor will they ever be heard by authorized committees of Congress while present conditions exist, unless the Senate votes the resolution now pending, or some resolution equivalent to it.

The deadly de facto will continue, says General Wood, until a treaty is concluded with Cuba. That means for all time, unless Cuba consents to some treaty that suits her convenience. She is in possession, says General Wood, and the de facto power will keep her in possession as long as it is profitable to keep the tobacco fields of Pinar del Rio on an equal footing, as to tariff charges in the United States, with the better tobacco fields of the Isle of Pines.

Our Americans have proofs that they have not yet presented, that satisfy them that they are being sacrificed to the tobacco trust. If they are forced to assert their rights against such combinations, they will come out in the open and meet their responsibilities without fear, relying on the people who love justice to take care of them in the American ballot box.

I have said that I fear the result of the rejection of this treaty almost as much as I fear the results of its ratification. It is not within the power of any nation to compel honest, sensible, and brave Americans to submit to such outrages as our people have suffered in the Isle of Pines. Strife and bloodshed will follow the attempt of Cuba to fasten these time-rusted Spanish chains around American necks. It was these chains that our people broke when Cuba was emancipated; and Cubans should be wiser than to suppose that Americans will ever wear them in peace. By the language of article 2 of the treaty the Government of the United States is placed in an unfortunate and humiliating attitude.

I will insert in my remarks, with the leave of the Senate, the contract between the Government of the United States and the Government of Cuba in respect to the lease of coaling stations on that island.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Lease to the United States by the Government of Cuba of certain areas of land and water for naval or coaling stations in Guantanamo and Bahia Honda.

Signed at Habana July 2, 1903.
Approved by the President October 2, 1903.
Ratified by the President of Cuba August 17, 1903.
Ratifications exchanged at Washington October 6, 1903.

* * * * * * *

ART. I. The United States of America agrees and covenants to pay to the Republic of Cuba the annual sum of $2,000, in gold coin of the United States, as long as the former shall occupy and use said areas of land by virtue of said agreement.

Mr. MORGAN. In the treaty we made with the Government of Cuba and in the Platt amendment it was inserted that Cuba would agree to confer upon us the right to make fortifications on that island at suitable coaling stations. For what purpose? For the purpose of the protection of the island and the people of Cuba and its Government. All the fortifications we agreed to make there were to have been for that purpose. Of course, collaterally and incidentally, they would have been for the protection of our coasts. Under their agreement the Government of Cuba was to receive from the United States $2,000 in gold a year for the lease of coaling stations at Guantanamo and Bahia Honda. No other consideration was mentioned.

That lease was signed nearly a year before this treaty was negotiated, and in this treaty it is recited that the Government of the United States relinquishes to Cuba the Isle of Pines, as follows:

ART. II. This relinquishment, on the part of the United States of America, of claim of title to the said Island of Pines is in consideration of the grants of coaling and naval stations in the island of Cuba heretofore made to the United States of America by the Republic of Cuba.

The consideration mentioned in those solemn compacts, which were signed by the Presidents of both Governments, was $2,000 gold, payable annually, and here in this treaty is a new consideration stated which is plainly an afterthought and for some concealed purpose—not an American purpose, but a Cuban purpose.

This $2,000 per annum was the full and only consideration for the lease, as expressed in the conveyance. How could it possibly have happened that on the 2d of March, 1904, an additional consideration was to be paid by the United States for this lease? Is the Senate to contradict the record in order to sustain this treaty, and declare that an indefinite and secret debt was due to Cuba on account of that lease, without having any knowledge or information of the amount due, or how, or by whom, or when it was contracted? Was that hidden debt of such amount that it equalled the value of the Isle of Pines? Was that sum as great as the sum paid by our people in the purchase of lands and in their improvement of them in the Isle of Pines? How has it ever occurred that the concealed consideration for the lease of coaling stations at Bahia Honda and Guantanamo, for which we pay $2,000 gold per annum, has mounted up to the whole value of the Isle of Pines, in addition to this expressed consideration? Whether this hidden consideration was an afterthought or a forethought, it was a hidden fact, that the official servants of the American people withheld from them and from the Congress of the United States. Did the people know that the United States had agreed, at any time before this treaty was negotiated, to sell the Isle of Pines to Cuba, and also to pay her $2,000 per annum for the lease of these coaling stations? Everything about these coaling-station leases seems to be dark and mysterious. The consideration for the lease of them is either falsely stated in the instrument of conveyance, dated July 2, 1903, or else it is falsely stated in article 2 of the treaty, dated March 2, 1904. They are absolutely irreconcilable. The Government gives no explanation of this startling discrepancy and the Senate owes the duty to the country of clearing it up, if that is possible.

It can not be cured by striking out article 2 of the treaty, as some propose. The statement is there, agreed to by the high contracting powers, and no agreement to change it will change the facts or conceal the pretense if it is false.

Both Governments would be self-stultified if that alleged consideration was suppressed. Its existence is affirmed as a fact by both Governments, and its suppression would be an admission that we had written a confessed falsehood in article 2 of the treaty until it is explained.

It must stand, or else a solemn record, made by the two Presidents in these conflicting documents, is impeached. This alleged, unknown, and hidden debt to Cuba, for which the treaty relinquishes the Isle of Pines to Cuba, is a fact or else it is a falsehood. If it is a fact, and if the debt is just, let the Senate examine the facts and do justice to Cuba. If it is set up as a stroke of Cuban policy, to reconcile the malcontents in Cuba to the lease of Bahia Honda and Guantanamo to the United States, which we lease and fortify for the express purpose of protecting Cuba, at great expense, as is stated in the treaty with that Republic, the United States is engaged in very small play, for an unworthy purpose, when it gives the Isle of Pines to Cuba as a placebo to suppress the criticisms and the false clamors of that dissatisfied element in Cuba.

We need not disfigure our diplomatic history with the admission of a false "consideration" for the treaty, in order to reconcile the mob in Cuba to the lease of coaling stations at Guantanamo and Bahia Honda. Our people think that all classes of Cubans have been pretty well paid for their condescension in accepting their lives and liberties at our hands.

If we were to sell the Isle of Pines to anybody let it be sold to the Americans who have already bought it and paid for it. They will pay more for it to Cuba, if need be, than Cuba can have the effrontery to claim is due her from the United States on this concealed "consideration" mentioned in article 2 of the treaty, and, after paying that claim, these true Americans will be proud to place it under the flag of our country as a redemption from oppressive government, without money and without price.

The Isle of Pines is a better tobacco country than Pinar del Rio, but this fact was as unknown to Cuba until the Americans proved it as the value of the remotest spot in the Kongo Free State.

This island is embraced in practically the same area of latitude and longitude as Pinar del Rio in Cuba. The prospectus of the "Las Ovas Syndicate" of Cuban lands, which I ask leave to print as an appendix to my remarks, omitting the map at present, shows that the climate of the Isle of Pines is superior to that of the Pinar del Rio, because it is 90 miles farther south and is directly in the course of the trade winds. They refresh the islands daily and drive off the tobacco pests that compel the tobacco planters of Pinar del Rio to raise their crops under canvas.

This prospectus gives a graphic description of the tobacco lands of the great American tobacco trust, which applies with greater force to the Isle of Pines.

It is this American tobacco trust that is "the Iliad of all the woes" of the people of the Isle of Pines. These trusts can not brook the thought that the productions of the Isle of Pines should find a home market in the United States. If the Senate refuses to investigate the facts that the Government seems to withhold from the people, the world will soon christen that beautiful possession of our people as the American vineyard of Naboth.

When the prospectus, or advertisement set forth in the appendix, was sent to me recently from the Isle of Pines, I handed it to Mr. Secretary Root. His comment upon it is in the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 6, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I return the pamphlet which you were good enough to loan me this morning, and which contains a statement that I, at some time, purchased land in Pinar del Rio, Cuba.

The statement is wholly false. I never purchased or owned or had any interest in, directly or indirectly, any land in Pinar del Rio or anywhere in Cuba. I can not imagine how such a statement as this pamphlet contains could have originated, for I never had anything to do in any way whatever with any land transaction in Cuba, and never heard of the estate described in the pamphlet. This seems to be an attempt to sell land by means of a perfectly gratuitous falsehood.

As the pamphlet is without signature or date, it is a little difficult to fix the responsibility for it, but I am causing inquiries to be made regarding the persons whose names appear as owners on the first page.

I am obliged to you for your courtesy, and beg you to believe me always, with high esteem,

Sincerely, yours, ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN, United States Senate.

This advertisement shows that this great syndicate of speculators were active in Pinar del Rio in capturing tobacco lands, and the reckless use of the name of Mr. Sceretary Root in their campaign of trust and monopoly shows forth one of the causes of their vicious antagonism to the honest home builders on the Isle of Pines. During this year a crop of tobacco has been harvested and sold in Habana at the price of the best tobacco produced in the Vuelta Abajo district. The place of its growth was concealed to prevent the American tobacco trust from greater exertions to drive our people from the Isle of Pines.

It was not until lately, Mr. President, that I got hold of what I believe to be a solution of this outrage upon the people of the Isle of Pines. I could not think that the American Government was so indifferent to their rights as to submit to the infliction of the wrongs that are stated in the affidavits and papers and set forth in the reports of the majority and the minority of the committee, and also in the remarks that I had the honor to submit to the Senate a week ago. It is almost impossible to believe them unless they were sustained by corroborating evidence, and they are fully sustained. They are true; and the people controlling this great tobacco trust in Pinar del Rio, who use Mr. Root's name and put it in this paper, and draw a map of an estate that he is alleged to have purchased there, are the men who after all are inflicting these the greatest hardships and these torments, for they are nothing else, upon the people of the Isle of Pines for the purpose of driving them out and compelling them to abandon their homes.

Why do they want the island to remain the property of Cuba? Because otherwise the people of the Isle of Pines are put upon an equality in traffic with the United States, with other parts of our country. They are under our tariff laws. If these men in the Isle of Pines, who raise better tobacco than they can raise in the Vuelta Abajo district, can send it to our home ports free of tariff dues, then, of course, the price of land that they have gone there and bought 10 acres at a time in that island will increase hundreds of per cent in value.

I will now leave this subject, Mr. President, in the hands of the Senate and in the hands of the friends of the Isle of Pines. I have bestowed upon it a great deal of attention and some hard work. I will repeat that I have no constituent there, except one poor fellow who, with his wife and two or three children, went there and obtained a 10-acre tract of land, and he has not written to me in two or three years. He appealed to me when these grievances began to alarm him to try to take care of him. That interested me in the subject, and in looking into it I saw that the Government of the United States, acting under some false idea of altruism and benefaction and generosity toward the Government of Cuba, was subjecting our people to outrages there that were impossible to be endured.

Here is this Isle of Pines advertisement put out by the Government of the United States, printed as a document for the use of Congress, issued from the Bureau of Insular Affairs during the time of the migration from the United States to the Isle of Pines, circulated by hundreds of thousands, no doubt, because they frequently speak of circulating it from the Bureau in reply to many anxious correspondents. Here is that document, one of the best advertisements of a country I have ever seen. It commences with the map, and around that they put the measurements of the depth of water, as ascertained by the United States Hydrographic Survey. Then they picture the mountains, and then, following it up, there is a long description, divided into chapters, to show forth the value of these properties and their convenience, especially for poor men who want to go there in their old age for the purpose of raising on a little patch of ground what they could not raise on very large farms, in money yield, at their homes in the United States.

The people went there. They went inquiringly, it is true. They did not move off hastily on any speculative enterprise. A common farming man or mechanic with a wife and five or six children, all of whom have to work, can not fit himself up and leave his home and go to a distant place, because he wishes to settle down there, without some assurance that when he gets there he is under the flag of his own country, that he is at home, on American soil, and has those rights which are so highly esteemed and are so greatly beneficial to large classes of our people.

Induced by these considerations they have gone to the Isle of Pines in good faith; but they did not go without inquiry. They wrote many letters to the Departments here—to the Department of State, but more especially to the Department of War, that had had charge of this island. The responses during Mr. McKinley's Administration were all that the property belonged to the United States. But they were made by an Assistant Secretary of War, and some of them by an officer who was detailed to that duty at the time, and I am sorry to say that Mr. Secretary Root comes out now and attempts to deny the authority of the men who put these answers to these letters on record. It was his business to know what was there, and I suppose he did; but at the time his attention probably had not been drawn to certain political questions that were supposed to be necessary to be handled in connection with the Isle of Pines and the government of Cuba.

But so it is that these people have gone there and settled upon these lands, paying for them, and they have made their homes. They own to-day nine-tenths, actually paid for, of the Isle of Pines, and paid for at high prices. Mr. Keenan, in his letter to me, says they own four-fifths of the island. That was two years ago. They have increased their holdings until they own nine-tenths of the island, and the balance of it is not held by the Cubans. It is held by Spaniards who have never submitted themselves to the Cuban Government, who have never accepted citizenship in Cuba—the old Spaniards who have been living there for many years.

Now, I claim, Mr. President, that when they apply to the Senate of the United States for an honorable committee to go down there and investigate this subject they ought to be gratified. I could not go on that committee. I am not physically able, and I have no thought of going. The honorable Vice-President, without a suggestion from me, can name any committee he pleases in the Senate to investigate these facts.

Mr. President, the people of the Isle of Pines have applied for it, they have appealed for it. They have to stand there and take insults and bear outrages at the hands of these people which, if committed on the mainland of this continent, would result in bloodshed instantly. They are patient and self-controlling. They know the difficulties which might arise from even one homicide in resentment of retallation for an outrage upon an American citizen. They are bold, strong, good, honest, sincere, upright people. They are not any frauds or intruders in any sense of the word. I will take a moment to say that no adventurer has yet gone to the Isle of Pines. Every man who has gone there has gone for the purpose of trying to better his situation.

The pending motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I must accept that motion as being fatal to the resolution, because when it gets to the committee I understand just what will become of it. The Senate will not see it any more.

I therefore ask the friends of this measure and of this investigation and of these people to vote "nay" upon the question of the reference of the resolution. Let the Senate take it up and vote directly on it and say whether or not they want it passed. The Committee on Foreign Relations does not know any more about this business than they ought, and if they had known as much about it as has been recently developed, I think that treaty never would have found its way into the Senate of the United States on a favorable report.

APPENDIX A.

The Las Ovas Syndicate lands.

The first 1,000 acres at $20 United States currency.

This syndicate reserves the right to raise the selling price of lands with one month's notice.

This syndicate has made arrangements with the Western Railroad of Habana that all persons wishing to examine our lands can secure tickets from Habana to Las Ovas and return for the price of one way.

The Western Railroad is also the only railroad in Cuba granting free transportation to settlers, their families, and furniture from Habana to their new homes.

The hacienda Las Ovas, containing from 8,000 to 10,000 acres, is situated about 20 miles from the foot of a range of mountains the altitude of which is from two to three thousand feet above sea level, which insures a continuous flow of pure spring water from wells which can be dug or driven from 15 to 40 feet.

The soil is peculiarly adapted to cultivation of citrus fruits, vegetables, and the finest tobacco, as this plantation, lying in the famous Vuelta Abajo district, supplies to the market some of the best tobacco grown in the world.

Irrigation is unnecessary, as the drainage from the mountain range insures moisture for the soil even in the dryest seasons of the year.

The northern portion of this estate, comprising about 5,558 acres, has been purchased by United States Secretary Elihu Root and Colonel Reed, who intend setting out a large portion to citrus fruits.

The portion of the hacienda Las Ovas purchased by the Las Ovas Land Syndicate lies directly south and southeast of the part secured by Secretary Root, and contains something over 3,000 acres, the north boundary of which lies about one and a half miles from the station of Las Ovas, on the Western Railroad.

As all titles to this property were properly traced at the time of purchase by Secretary Root, the Las Ovas Syndicate will positively guarantee a title absolutely clear of all incumbrances—which very few other land companies are prepared to do on the island of Cuba—upon any tract purchased when the last payment upon such tract has been paid.

This property has been surveyed into 40-acre tracts, that can again be divided into 10, 20, or 30 acre tracts, to suit the purchaser.

As this syndicate has been peculiarly favored by not having the great expense of looking up titles and the clearing off of the same, and wishing our patrons to benefit by this circumstance, we are putting the first one hundred 10-acre lots on the market for $20 United States currency per acre, while there are companies in Cuba offering much inferior land for from $30 to $50 per acre.

Remember that this land lies in the famous Vuelta Abajo district, which, without a doubt, supplies the best tobacco grown in the world.

Last season there were egg fruit grown without fertilizer on this property weighing over 3 pounds.

One of our tenants proudly boasts that he smokes cigars as good as those enjoyed by King Edward or President Roosevelt, and that he grows the tobacco himself.

OUR PROPOSITION.

After years of experience in Cuba, we have just bought this land, and have considered everything which is necessary, and have now to show you that we have just the place for good profit, comfortable distances, and quick returns. We have studied out the problem of how a man can live while his grove is coming on, as we have the finest vegetable land in the world, and only four days from New York market. We can ship cheaper than Florida or California; we can ship fruit and vegetables when the rest of the world is frozen, thus commanding the highest prices paid for those articles during the year.

Don't buy land in out-of-the-way places. Our land lies right next to the finest tobacco farms in the world, where each acre has its tenant. The distance to the town of Pinar del Rio is only 6 miles, which allows the ladies to market in a good large city, and is a point which should be well considered. We have on the east of our land the celebrated Suarez tobacco farm, and 4 miles west is the farm of Calixto Lopez, of tobacco fame. This shows clearly that we have the heart of a lovely district, and you can buy a small tract of this same land just now at $20 per acre.

We have divided section No. 6 into sixty-four lots of half an acre each, so as to enable prospective home seekers that only wish to visit Cuba during two or three months to rest from the severe winters and do not care to go into farming on a large scale, just exactly what they require. Our idea is to have a town of country homes, allowing each land enough for a fine fruit and vegetable garden. Fine streets, with-wide sidewalks, planted with palms and ornamental fruit trees, a beautiful natural lake (10 acres) with walks all around. The syndicate will make all roads, sidewalks, parks, etc.

We have a few plans and estimates of houses that are submitted to us by several American builders, a copy of which will be forwarded to purchasers of a lot. A nice home can be completed at a cost of $2,000, and the syndicate will care for garden and home at the rate of $50 per year.

The water on this estate is guaranteed good as any in the world, and is shipped to wealthy Cubans at Pinar del Rio and Habana.

We simply offer you a chance to find a good home in the Tropics, on good high land, with fresh, cool air, good fishing, and some hunting, in a place which will shortly be the finest orange district in Cuba, to say nothing about the large tobacco farms on all sides, as this is in the heart of the famous Vuelta Abajo tobacco district. On our east is Suarez tobacco plantation, on the west is Calixto Lopez farm, on the north is Cayo Roble, on the south is Dias's lands—all very famous for their fine tobacco, the best in the world.

We are now offering these fine half acre lots at $100 each.

FACTS ABOUT CUBA.

Extract from folder issued by the Western Railroad of Habana (Limited):

"The next point of interest is the fine steel viaduct of Santa Clara, built to replace a timber trestle of over 300 meters in length, which was burned during the late war. After crossing the Santa Clara viaduct the line rises up to the prosperous town of Consolacion del Sud, 154 kilometers from Habana.

"A large tract of land in this neighborhood has been secured by the American Cigar Company for the establishment of extensive tobacco plantations.

"The whole of this district, as also that of Puerto de Golpe and Las Ovas, the next town passed, is famous for its high-class tobacco, some of the most celebrated plantations of the province being in this neighborhood.

"After a run of 10 kilometers from Las Ovas the city of Pinar del Rio, the capital of the province and the present terminus of the railway, is arrived at.

"Pinar del Rio is a prosperous town of some 10,000 inhabitants, famous throughout the world for its incomparable tobacco plantations."

The population of the city of Pinar del Rio has now increased to about 20,000.

In the continuous strife for existence against the pitiless forces of nature many fail, others succeed, but usually reach old age bearing all the scars of hard, incessant toil. Round shoulders and bent backs tell the story too plainly. Theirs is a case of survival of the fittest, and only those hardy pioneers of the Anglo-Saxon race have the tenacity, the perseverance to wrest a competency from the soil midst conditions so unfavorable.

But the sons of these hardy tillers of the frozen earth pause before starting on the cold, stormy path of their forefathers. Many have means and all have the benefit of that splendid school system of the United States. It is to this class of men that Cuba appeals, and to them she offers more than any other country in the world. Health, comfort, and prosperity are here, and may be had quicker, more plentifully, and with greater certainty than in any other climate. As one enthusiastic Kentuckian remarked this winter: "If the people of the United States knew the actual facts in regard to Cuba you could not keep them out with shotguns.

But they do not know them, as the writer discovered recently while visiting the great North and Middle West. It is with the hope of correcting some false impressions in regard to the island that the following facts have been briefly grouped:

There is no healthier or pleasanter climate in any part of the world. Both yellow fever and smallpox have been banished for all time, neither of these diseases having appeared here since the beginning of this century.

There are neither snow, ice, nor cold rains during the winter, and frost is found only on the highest mountains.

There is not a single poisonous snake, and very few reptiles of any kind are found on the island.

No island or strip of coast in the world is more plentifully supplied with deep, well-protected harbors than in the Republic of Cuba.

The soil is famous throughout the world for its fertility.

Fine fresh water streams and valuable medicinal springs abound in every province.

The distribution of showers or rainfall occurring during the summer and fall months is especially beneficial to the luxurious growth of all crops, while the dry months of winter and spring favor gathering of same at a time most advantageous for shipment to northern markets.

Nearly all of the staple agricultural products of the Tropical and sub-Tropical Zone are indigenous to Cuba, and are found growing wild in the forests at the present time. Among them are tobacco, cotton, coffee, cocoa, india rubber, oranges, lemons, limes, and sisal or manila hemp.

It has been demonstrated beyond doubt that cane sugar of the best quality can be produced here in greater abundance and more cheaply than in any other country in the world.

The famous Cuban tobacco from Vuelta Abajo district of Pinar del Rio Province has never been equaled in any other part of the world.

The report of the average mean temperature at Habana for ten years prior to 1901 is as follows: January, 70.3; February, 72; March, 73.2; April, 76.1; May, 78.8; June, 81.2; July, 82.4; August, 82.2; September, 80.7; October, 78.1; November, 75.3; December, 71.4.

As to extremes of temperature for the past years the reports of the United States Weather Bureau in Habana reported them as follows for the two winter and two summer months here mentioned: For December, 1902, mean temperature, 72.6; highest temperature, 85; lowest, 56; greatest daily range, 17°; lowest daily range, 4°.

In February, 1903, the mean temperature was 75°; highest temperature, 86; lowest, 60; greatest daily range, 18; least daily range, 5.

For July, 1903, the highest temperature recorded was 91°; the lowest, 66; greatest daily range, 21; least daily range, 12. The mean temperature for the month was 80.2.

For August last the record is as follows: Highest temperature, 90°; lowest, 70°; greatest daily range, 19°; least daily range, 11°; mean temperature for the month (the hottest of the year), 80.3°.

Cuban climatological data for the year 1900, published by the United States Weather Bureau, give the annual mean temperature in Pinar del Rio (observations taken in the city of Pinar del Rio) as 76.7°; highest temperature, 94°; lowest, 50°.

These statistics thoroughly and truthfully sketch the climatic conditions of western Cuba, but one can not really appreciate its attractiveness until he has had actual experience of the south Cuban atmosphere, warm in middle of day, but always tempered by freshest of sea breezes, and in Pinar del Rio especially, by proximity of the long range of mountainous hills, whose slopes and heights and forests afford refreshment to the eye and convenient places for change and recuperation the year round for dwellers on the fertile lands of which they are the northern boundary.

"Probably no place on earth has a finer climate than the main portion of Cuba. The atmosphere is never misty and does not lose its transparency with the departure of day. A glorious and beautiful sunset daily, a climate so uniformly soft and mild, fruit so delicious and abundant, flowers so plentiful and ever blooming that it is almost akin to what has been described of fairyland." (Ballou, in Cuba Past and Present.)

"The mean annual temperature is 77°. The range of temperature between the mean of the hottest month and that of the coldest is from 82° to 71°, or only 11°. The highest temperature on record in Habana is 100.6° and the lowest 49.6°." (Census of Cuba. Compare with California climate.)

"The mean annual rainfall at Habana, derived from observation of many years, is 52 inches. The record shows in different years a rainfall ranging from 46 to 71 inches." (Census of Cuba.)

"During my residence on the island, over four years, there was not an average of two days when it rained all day or when the sun was obscured. The rainy season is from May to October and the dry from November to April." (United States Consul Hyatt.)

"Yellow fever is entirely stamped out in Cuba." (Doctor Baker, medical health officer.)

"The climate of Cuba is more salubrious than has been painted. The winter months are delightful, in fact, ideal; while the summer months are more endurable than most parts of our own country." (Robert T. Hill, United States Geological Survey.)

"Northerners, unaccustomed to the Tropics, think that Cuba must be unbearably hot. The truth is that the scorching days we sometimes have in the cities of the United States during the summer are entirely unknown on the island. Cuba weather is like our best days in May and June, but moderate, being maintained throughout the year." (United States Consul Hyatt.)

CUBA.

Cuba of the olden time, with its record of revolution, robbery, and ruin, its history of crime, cruelty, and suffering, is gone.

The new, the clean, bright, and hopeful Cuba has come. From the ashes of sad and distressing past, the Republic has sprung into life—prosperous, promising, successful life.

The prophecy of political and commercial failure in six months was not fulfilled. Several years have passed, and the island Government still lives; confidence, at home and abroad, spreads like oil on troubled waters; its credit is established and fixed in the markets of the world. No one can foretell the glorious future which awaits the Pearl of the Antilles.

It is true that sacrifice, sad, almost ruinous, must still be made; that property once valued in thousands must be sold for hundreds; but with a clean slate, a new régime, the real, prosperous, modern life of the nation has begun on a prosperous basis. When the prospective purchaser, looking across some great meadow of Guinea or Parana, grumbles at the price and says something about $1.25, he forgets that less than a decade ago this very tract was one vast field of waving cane and valued at from $150 to $500 per acre instead of, as at present, a paltry $20. He fails to consider that every acre of it will produce a beef each year worth $25.

And, again, when you show him the beautiful orange land, sloping away from the mountains of Pinar del Rio, at $25, he tries to tell you of some place he once heard of for half that price. When you assure him that if planted in citrus fruits and cared for for five years it will be worth $1,500 an acre, he looks at you with pitying contempt.

But when you point out to him the tobacco lands of the famous Vuelta Abajo, which he can not purchase for less than $1,000 per acre, simply because the owners frequently get $2,000 in three months from an acre under cheese cloth, he usually drops dead or murmurs something about a man who offered to sell him plenty of land about 50 miles south of "Mantanzas" for 50 cents, one-third cash and the balance after Cuba is annexed to the United States.

Seriously speaking, lands to-day are dirt cheap in Cuba—absurdly so when one stops to consider what they may be made to produce with capital and intelligent effort. Present prices will continue only to the time when the outside world begins to realize that if selected with judgment and due regard for transportation facilities every acre in Cuba, properly cultivated, will pay for itself twice, if not ten times over, in the first year.

TITLES.

In this connection it may be opportune to state that there is no excuse for not securing perfect titles to property, since every register of deeds in Cuba is a bonded officer of the Government, and a certificate from him stating that a piece of property is free from all incumbrances or cloud on its title is virtually a title from the Government itself and can not be questioned as to its validity.

Property rights to-day in Cuba are better protected than in the United States of America.

TOBACCO.

Cuba has always been not only famous for its tobacco, but for producing a quality absolutely without rival in points of flavor and delicacy of aroma. But, although the tobacco plant is indigenous and grows luxuriantly all over the island, it is nevertheless true that the really fine grades can be grown only in two little sections, each measuring about 15 miles square, and the two separated by some 80 miles. Their soils are in no way similar, except that the tobacco grown on them is the best in the world.

One of these famous tobacco districts is known as the Vuelta Abajo of Pinar del Rio. It is located around and particularly to the southward of the capital of that province.

Tobacco grown in the Vuelta Abajo brings from four to five times as much as that grown in other parts of the island.

Mr. Iliseo Cartaye, who is in charge of the estates belonging to the American Tobacco Company, assured me that the crop grown under cheese cloth, by which every leaf is free from wormholes and consequently becomes a wrapper, is worth from $2,000 to $5,000 per acre in the Habana market. From one acre last winter he cut fourteen bales of tobacco, which sold for $300 per bale, or at the rate of $4,200 per acre.

It is needless to say that for fruit culture and vegetable growing it would be hard to find a more desirable place in the world than the province of Pinar del Rio. Soil, climate, health, scenery, and transportation facilities are perfect. It will take only a few more years to make this the garden spot of Cuba.

It is an undisputed fact that Pinar del Rio Province leads the world in its quality of tobacco.

"No country of the world grows tobacco which can be compared with the Cuban leaf. The immense plantations have been destroyed or neglected during the recent war, but opportunities are now offered to the shrewd business man and investor to enjoy the profits which are certain to follow the revival of this enormous industry." (Munson.)

"It has been calculated that on an estate of 75 acres, having a planting capacity of 1,000,000 tobacco plants, the net result for one crop would be about $50,000." (Bureau of American Republics.)

"An English company paid $1,000,000 for 1,800 acres of tobacco lands, or $555 per acre." (Industrial Cuba, by Robert Porter.)

"Tobacco yields $200 to $1,000 per acre profit." (C. M. Pepper, To-morrow in Cuba.)

"Pinar del Rio, the western province, has for generations produced the finest tobacco in the world. The possibilities of profitable fruit cultivation in this section are illimitable." (Munson.)

"The province of Pinar del Rio is probably the richest and most progressive part of the whole island. The unrivaled quality of the tobacco raised there and the high prices which have been obtained for the same are the principal sources of wealth in this province. It is a prosperous, law-abiding community, and is eminently a rural province." (Brig. Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, in his report to War Department, p. 343.)

Ex-United States Consul P. F. Hyatt says: "The island has opportunities for success and wealth through safe and profitable investments, the equal of which can be found in no other place."

Thomas B. Reed, ex-Speaker, in the Chicago Chronicle, said the island contained more natural wealth than any country he had ever seen.

"Only the most positive indolence and shiftlessness and the long-applied hand of an oppressive government have prevented Cuba from being one of the most, if not the most, prolific and profitable spots in the world." (Consul Hyatt.)

"Cuba is a wonderful country, rich beyond comprehension in her marvelous soil and climate. Rich in her mines, her quarries, a matchless forest. Ideally located just at the door of the world's markets, with a practical monopoly of scores of the most eagerly sought products of the soil." (Cuban Colonist.)

Extract from letter to writer: "The political situation in Cuba is such that I would hesitate to invest any funds of my own in the island." (Leonard Wood, military governor of Cuba.)

Sir William Van Horne, who has built the Cuban railroad and has, with his friends, invested many millions of money in Cuba, says: "Cuba is the richest country in the world. The Cubans will make good citizens, and investments there are safe."

Gen. Leonard Wood, ex-governor-general of Cuba, says: "If I were called upon at this time to designate a place where a young man of America could find the greatest opportunity I would name the island of Cuba. * * * There is a future for industrious Americans who go to Cuba."

"I advise the culture of oranges, lemons, coffee, cocoanuts, and bananas. Sixty-five per cent of England's vast wealth is derived from her investments in the Tropics." (Mexican G. A. Co.)

"The price for a tract in the vicinity of Habana with good communications, suitable for truck gardening, fruit raising, etc., ranges from $100 to $150 per acre. Such tracts near Habana have the advantage of a good market for vegetables, fruits, etc." (Extract from letter to writer.)

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I will ask that the matter go over, as other gentlemen desire to be heard upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. HALE. What becomes of the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's motion is pending.

Mr. HALE. Why does it not go to the Calendar?

Mr. LODGE. The motion is pending to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It ought to go to the Calendar, I think, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN subsequently said: The resolution which has just gone to the Calendar has the privilege of being called from the desk of the Vice-President attached to it by various orders that the Senate has heretofore very indulgently made. The Senator from Maine was not conscious of that, and I ask that the resolution go on the Calendar with these privileges.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution has gone to the Calendar. It can not be taken up except by motion. If it is going to lie on the table, it can be called up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LODGE. If it is going to be left where it can be called up at any time, it ought to lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will kindly restate his request.

Mr. MORGAN. The first day that this resolution was taken up I discussed it, commencing at a late hour in the morning and proceeding until 2 o'clock. The Senate very kindly indeed gave its consent to lay aside the regular order that I might continue. I was not in a condition of physical strength and health to go on. I then asked that the privilege which I had before that time secured from the Senate for taking up the resolution on my call might be continued along with the resolution. I have no more remarks to submit on it at any time, but I have the right to call it up at any time for a vote; and if other gentlemen desire to argue it, of course they will have the right to argue it. I merely wish to ask that those privileges be continued in respect to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the resolution will lie on the table subject to call.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 6191.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. HOPKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had hoped to be able to call up the District of Columbia appropriation bill during the morning hour, but that was impossible. I will now say that when the Senator from Illinois concludes his remarks, unless some other Senator desires to discuss the unfinished business, I will then ask that the District of Columbia appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me that I may ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17415) to authorize the assignees of coal-land locations to make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska. It passed the House and it is reported by the Senate committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOPKINS. If it does not take any time I will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 17415) to authorize the assignees of coal-land locations to make entry under the coal-land laws applicable to Alaska.

Mr. KEAN. From what committee does the bill come?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KEAN. I thought we were going on with the unfinished business; that the Senator from Illinois was going to speak, and after that we were going to consider the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KEAN. I think we had better have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I regret that the Committee on Interoceanic Canals has not been able to present to the Senate a unanimous report on the question of the type of canal that is to be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama.

A wealth of material has been furnished by the reports of the Board of Consulting Engineers, the Isthmian Canal Commission, the report of the Secretary of War to the President, and the letter of the President to Congress. In addition to that, hearings have been held by the committee, extending over a period of several months, where a number of the most eminent engineers of the country have given testimony upon this subject. The committee was nearly evenly divided on the question of the type of the canal. On the test vote had in the committee, six recorded themselves in favor of the sea-level canal and five against—the five at that time standing for the lock canal proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and approved by the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Secretary of War, and the President.

Under the Spooner Act approved June 28, 1902, the President holds, and in this he is supported by Judge Taft, the Secretary of War, that a fair interpretation of that act authorizes the construction of a lock canal of the general plan of that proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. And up to this time the President and the Secretary of War and the Isthmian Canal Commission have proceeded upon the idea that the character of the canal across the Isthmus should be a lock canal of the general proportions and conditions of that proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. The President, however, in his message to Congress stated:

> The law now on our statute books seems to contemplate a lock canal. In my judgment, a lock canal, as herein recommended is advisable. If the Congress directs that a sea-level canal be constructed, its direction will, of course, be carried out. Otherwise the canal will be built on substantially the plan for a lock canal outlined in the accompanying papers, such changes being made, of course, as may be found actually necessary, including possibly the change recommended by the Secretary of War as to the site of the dam on the Pacific side.

If the House of Representatives entertains the same view that the President and Secretary Taft do, that, under the Spooner Act, the President is authorized to construct a lock canal of the general type suggested in the report of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, and that no change should be made now in the type of the canal that we are attempting to construct across the Isthmus, a vote of the Senate in favor of a sea-level canal will only result in putting this body in antagonism with the other branch of Congress and in opposition to the well-known wishes of the Administration respecting the type of canal that shall ultimately be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama. While this suggestion should not have a controlling influence upon any Senator's vote, it is a matter, however, that should cause each individual Senator to examine more carefully the merits and demerits of the two types of canal that are advocated, and if the Senate can agree on the type of the canal with the House of Representatives and the President, a conflict between the two branches of Congress that would be most unfortunate indeed will be avoided and all can look upon the harmonious action of Congress and the Administration on this subject as the beginning of the end of the completion of this great engineering project.

For more than three hundred years the dream of all navigators has been to see a canal across this Isthmus. As early as 1520 Charles V of Spain ordered a survey of the Isthmus of Panama with the object in view of constructing a canal across the same. His successor Philip II reversed his policy in this respect, and for nearly two hundred years this idea was not prosecuted by the Spanish Government. It was in the early part of the nineteenth century that navigators became more active and earnest in their desire to see a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. After the successful revolts of Spain's provinces in South America, this subject received attention from President Bolivar, who commissioned a man by the name of Lloyd in 1827 to ascertain the most feasible route across it either for a road or a canal. Nothing, however, came from this survey and report of Lloyd. In 1838 a concession was granted to a French company for the construction of macadamized roads, railroads, or a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. This attempt proved abortive and nothing further of a definite and serious character was undertaken until 1879 or thereabouts, when a company was chartered under the laws of France, and Ferdinand De Lesseps became the chief engineer of the company. After an expenditure of nearly $260,000,000 in an attempt to construct a sea-level canal, his company went into the hands of a receiver, and De Lesseps, broken in spirit, went to his grave. In 1894 a new company was formed under the name of the New Panama Canal Company, organized under the laws of France, in which the receiver and the old company were made a part, and work was resumed on the Isthmus. In 1899 the United States began to seriously consider the proposition of constructing a canal across the Isthmus. A Commission was appointed under the authority of law to consider the subject. This Commission reported January 18, 1902, in favor of the Panama route.

The act of Congress, to which I have already referred, approved June 28, 1902, authorized the President to acquire, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, franchises, and property of this New Panama Canal Company, and directed the President to cause to be constructed a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean "of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use and such as may be reasonably anticipated." The subsequent history of this canal project is too familiar to the Senate and the country for me to repeat here.

There is something attractive in the very name "sea-level canal." It carries to the mind and imagination an open waterway between the two oceans of sufficient depth and width to permit vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest breadth to pass and repass as easily and as safely as they float upon the high seas. Such a canal would indeed realize the dreams of the early navigators, who talked of the "Straits of Panama." If such a canal could be constructed within the limits of the reasonable resources of the Government and within a period of time that those who are now engaged in it could see its successful completion, I think there would be little opposition to a sea-level canal. Such a canal, however, would cost the Government of the United States from six to eight hundred million dollars, and would require twenty-five years, at least, to construct it.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator please give the source of his information upon which he bases the statement regarding the time and cost of construction of such a canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, that is what I am here for to-day. I propose, before I close, to take up every one of the propositions involved in the construction of a sea-level canal, and not only give the reasons that I have for expressing my belief, but to show the authorities upon which that belief is predicated. I am not going to mislead the Senate upon any one of these propositions; and I repeat that a canal of the character of which I have spoken—the ideal canal, not the canal that the Senator from South Dakota has recommended be constructed, but the ideal canal—will cost from six to eight hundred million dollars, and can not be constructed in less time than a period of twenty-five years.

Mr. President, whenever we come to discuss a proposition of this kind——

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Illinois to state that there was a purpose here to reverse the action of Congress on the subject of the type of canal. I ask the Senator if he contends that Congress has in any way passed upon the canal recommended by the President?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida gave little attention to what I have said thus far, if he did not fully understand and appreciate my position. I said that the President contends—and I read from his message to that effect to the Senate a moment ago—that under the Spooner Act, so called, and under the advice of Judge Taft, one of the greatest legal minds of this country, if Congress takes no action upon this question he is fully authorized to construct a lock canal of the general type and character proposed by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. If the Senator had read the message of the President, which accompanies the report of the Board of Consulting Engineers, it would have been unnecessary for him to put that question to me.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I am quite as familiar with the report, with the message of the President, and with the testimony before the committee, as is the Senator from Illinois, but what I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois is this: If the canal which it was understood was recommended to Congress by the Isthmian Canal Commission prior to the passage of the Spooner bill contemplates this dam which the minority report proposes and which the President recommends at Gatun?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I have not been speaking thus far as to the location of any dam or as to where any dam should be located. When I reach that point I shall be glad to take it up and discuss it fully and completely. I simply stated the general type and character of the canal. That language is comprehensive enough to locate a dam at Bohio or Gatun. But I can not stop at this stage of my remarks to discuss that question, because to do so would throw me out of the logical line that I have outlined for my discussion here this afternoon.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him. I only wished to address myself to his suggestion that the report of the committee on the type of canal was a proposition looking to a reversal of some previous act of Congress. That is all.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator from Florida and I can not agree upon that any better than we can agree upon the type of the canal.

When I was interrupted by the Senator from Florida, I was calling the attention of Senators to the fact that when we speak of the construction of a canal across Panama and the ease with which it can be constructed our minds naturally revert to the Suez Canal. That being a sea-level canal, easily constructed and easily maintained, the conclusion is naturally reached by Senators that a canal can be constructed as easily and maintained as cheaply cross Panama. I wish to call their attention to the fact of the difference in the conditions under which the Suez Canal was constructed and under which a canal must be constructed at Panama, if constructed at all.

The Suez Canal is constructed through a flat, level, sandy country, uninterrupted by any stream; the conditions are healthful, and no serious trouble of any kind was encountered in the construction of the canal. This proposed canal is less than 10 degrees above the equator. It is a tropical country and a tropical heat that must be encountered by the workmen in charge of the construction of this canal. The rainy season covers a period of about eight months out of the twelve in each year, and the annual rainfall aggregates between 10 and 11 feet. The topography of the country is uneven. The highest point is at Culebra, where it is several hundred feet above the level of the sea. At this point is the Continental Divide. West of this the land is uneven and drained by the Rio Grande which empties into Panama Bay. East of this Divide the waters of the Isthmus flow into the Caribbean Sea. There are twenty-six rivers in all that must be considered and cared for in the construction of a sea-level canal. The largest and most important of these rivers is the Chagres. As Senators can see from the map before them, it takes its source in the San Blas Mountains to the northeast. The course of this river in a general way is parallel to the Caribbean coast as far as the mouth of the Obispo, where it turns to the northward and follows a somewhat crooked course to the Atlantic rim of its upper basin at Bohio, 13 miles below the mouth of the Obispo. At Gatun, which is 10 or 11 miles below Bohio, following the general course of the valley, the river deviates to the westward, and after a further course of 7 or 8 miles, discharges into the sea about 5 miles west of Point Toro. Above Bohio the Chagres Valley is hilly. These hills become steeper toward the source of the river where the country is mountainous. At Alhajuela, in a straight line north of Obispo, the low water surface of the river is about 95 feet above sea level, and at the mouth of the Obispo it is 45 feet. At Bohio it is practically at sea level. From Bohio to Gatun it is nearly at sea level. At Gatun, as Senators can see from the map which is before them, there are rocks and hills of considerable size, height, and proportions.

The sea-level canal, proposed by the majority of the committee, now under consideration in the bill before us, begins practically at the same point in Limon Bay as provided in the lock canal advocated by the minority members of the Interoceanic Canal Committee, and continues with but little change from the lock canal to the mouth of the Mindi River, near the shore of Limon Bay, a distance of 4½ miles. This distance the proposed canal is to be 500 feet in width. On the shore of Limon Bay it is reduced to 150 feet in bottom width when the excavation is in earth and 200 feet when in rock. Senators will see, by an examination of the map, that instead of constructing the canal through the waters of Limon Bay to the mouth of the Mindi, that for quite a distance it is proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, whose type of canal has been adopted by the majority of the members of the Interoceanic Canal Committee favoring the sea-level type, to construct through the rock and land on the shore of Limon Bay. The general route adopted for a sea-level canal from near the mouth of the Mindi to Obispo, follows the valley of the Chagres River, and crosses and recrosses it at several points between Gatun and Obispo. From Obispo it follows the valley of the Obispo River and passes over the Continental Divide at about the same point selected by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers for the lock canal, and passes from Pedro Miguel to Miraflores and thence through the swamps in the valley of the Rio Grande River to Sosa Hill, or to a point near Sosa Hill, where an arrangement is made for duplicate tidal locks 1,000 feet in length and 100 feet in width and 40 feet in depth. The lock on the Pacific side is necessary because of the tide oscillations of the Pacific, which vary 23 feet. As proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, this canal for a distance of 19.47 miles will be 200 feet in bottom width and for a distance of 20.39 miles 150 feet in bottom width. The locks on the Pacific side will be little over a half a mile in length. The uniform depth of the canal is about 40 feet, except in Panama Bay the channel is about 35 feet deep at spring tides, which will give a full 40 feet, provided at other points in the canal.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Would the Senator be willing to state in that connection the maximum width of the Suez Canal?

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, yes; I can. The Senator from South Dakcta wants me to indicate the width of the Suez Canal. The Suez Canal, as I have said, and as I will show later on in my remarks, is constructed in an entirely different manner than it is proposed to construct the Panama Canal. It runs through a different character of country, and the curvatures are different. The mean width of the Suez Canal is 108 feet, and, as I now remember, 28 or 29 feet in depth. It is proposed to deepen it to 31 feet.

Mr. KITTREDGE. It is 31 feet deep now.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the width of the Suez Canal is so narrow, as I will show later in my remarks, that with the class of vessels that go through it it is necessary to have passing places where ships can pass and repass each other. In such places the canal is widened to 147 feet, with a uniform distance of about 2,400 feet. In other words, Senators, the Suez Canal as originally constructed does not meet the commercial needs of the age, and they are widening and deepening it to meet the requirements of the vessels that pass through it.

An inspection of the map will show to Senators that it is utterly impossible to procure a straight channel from one ocean to the other in a sea-level canal. The topography of the country is such that the engineers who favor the sea-level canal have been compelled to recommend its construction on a series of curves, nineteen in all, with a total of 597° of curvature. The Suez Canal, which is nearly twice as long as the proposed Panama Canal, has a curvature of only 467½° and only fifteen curves. The length of the curves in the Suez Canal is 13 miles, or about 13 per cent of the length of the canal. The length of the curves in the sea-level canal proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers is 19 miles, or about 38.8 per cent of the length of the proposed canal.

I wish to call Senators' attention to this fact and to emphasize it, that if you exclude from your estimate the straight stretches of the channels in Limon Bay and across the shore of the bay to the mouth of the Mindi River, which is a distance of 4½ miles, and the distance in Panama Bay, where the canal is 300 feet in width and 4 miles in length, the curved portion of the land part of the sea-level canal is 47 per cent. From the shore line of Limon Bay, where the canal is reduced to 150 feet width in the bottom, to Obispo, a distance of between 25 and 26 miles, the curvature is 13.65 miles, or more than 50 per cent. And from a point 2 miles above Gatun to Obispo, a distance of 20.40 miles, the length of the curvature is 12.12 miles, or 59 per cent of the distance. No sea-level canal has ever been built with such curvatures, and, in my judgment, no sea-level canal of the width of prism here proposed can ever be successfully operated with these curvatures, as proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and as apparently approved by the majority of this committee that have reported in favor of this bill for a sea-level canal. In this distance, 2 miles above Gatun to Obispo, which is 20.40 miles, the percentage of curvature to straight courses is 4½ times the percentage of curve length in the Suez Canal. Senators must remember that for a goodly portion of the distance between the terminus of the canal in Limon Bay and a point near Obispo the canal is only 150 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet below sea level. There are a number of commercial ships now in use with a breadth of beam of between 75 and 80 feet, and others that have a breadth of beam from 80 to 85 feet, and the two new Cunarders that are now being built have a breadth of beam of 88 feet. There are a number of war ships in use or projected that average from 80 to 85 feet in breadth of beam. Suppose any of these ships of the breadth of beam that I have mentioned attempted to pass each other in the canal at any point between Limon Bay and Obispo, is there any Senator that has followed the figures that I have given—and they are all taken from official sources—who would say that it would be possible for these ships to pass each other in the narrow channel proposed by the Board of Consulting Engineers in their sea-level project? It is apparent that if we are to follow in the consideration of this canal the direction given by Congress in the Spooner Act, that such canal shall be of "sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use and such as may be reasonably anticipated," that the sea-level canal must be rejected.

If a sea-level canal is to be built, it must be built upon a different plan and become a larger and more costly canal than the one that is proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

The engineer in charge of the Suez Canal and a member of the majority of the Consulting Board, whose advice as to a sea-level canal has been followed by the majority of the Interoceanic Canal Committee of the Senate, says that at times there is a current equal to 2.6 miles an hour in the Suez Canal, and that in such a current large vessels do not steer well. Senators will remember that the average degree of curvature in the Suez Canal is only 4.9° a mile, and yet, with a current at 2.6 miles an hour, the vessels of the size that are carried through the Suez Canal find it difficult to navigate. What would be the result, I ask you, if any one of those vessels should attempt to navigate this proposed sea-level canal along the lines outlined in this map before us? The canal that is over the stretch of territory from Obispo nearly to Gatun has a curvature of 20° a mile, or more than four times the curvature of the Suez Canal. The importance of the considerations that I am here presenting to the Senate will become more important still when I call your attention to the fact that the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers admit that during the wet season, which, as I have already shown, covers a period of between seven and eight months a year, that a current will exist in the canal varying from 1 mile an hour to 2.64 miles an hour. If vessels do not steer well in the Suez Canal in a current equal to 2.6 miles an hour, how will it be possible to steer a vessel at all of the size contemplated in the Spooner Act in the narrow channel that will exist between Limon Bay and Obispo with a current of 2.64 miles an hour? It is apparent from these figures, that are undisputed in this case, that it would be dangerous during the rainy season on the Isthmus to attempt to navigate the sea-level canal as proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers at any time when the current in the canal is over 2 miles an hour. Senators must remember that the sea-level canal is only to be 40 feet below the sea level and that the largest type of ships that are now being built will have a draft of from 36 to 38 feet, leaving a distance of only 2 feet between the keel of the ship and the bottom of the canal. Under the conditions here shown, it would be dangerous for any of the large type of ships contemplated in the Spooner Act to attempt to pass through the sea-level canal during the rainy season.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. In that 20 miles what is the velocity of the current per hour? You said 2.64.

Mr. HOPKINS. It varies from 1 to 2.64 miles per hour. The chief engineer of the Suez Canal says that when the current in that canal is 2.6 miles it is difficult to navigate ships of even small type through that canal.

Mr. KNOX. And with a less curvature.

Mr. HOPKINS. And with less curvature, the curvature of the proposed Panama Canal being four times the curvature of the Suez Canal.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KITTREDGE. If the Senator will not mind, I wish, in this connection, to call the attention of the Senate to the testimony taken before the committee, appearing on page 827 and subsequent pages, regarding the ships that are passed through the Suez Canal.

Mr. HOPKINS. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. KITTREDGE. It is the testimony of General Davis. On those three or four pages will be found a complete answer to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to inquire whether the statement that the velocity of the current at maximum is 2.64 miles per hour is correct.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; 2.64 miles per hour.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The current through the proposed sea-level canal will not exceed a mile or a mile and a half an hour. It is possible that if great floods—two of which have happened in the last fifty years—should occur for a period not exceeding sixty hours, the current might run as high as two and a half or two and six-tenths miles per hour, but not for a longer period than sixty hours, as I have stated.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator from South Dakota upon that proposition. The testimony can be read. During the rainy season the current at any of these times is liable to reach a velocity of 2.64 miles per hour.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not wish to be interrupted; I desire to finish. The Senator can have his time.

Mr. FORAKER. How do they calculate that?

Mr. HOPKINS. They calculate that from the amount of water that will flow into the canal from the Chagres River and from the other rivers that cross and recross the canal. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that there are fifteen or sixteen of these rivers, which are not provided for at all by the majority of the committee and by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, but which will discharge their waters unobstructed into the sea-level canal after it is constructed.

Now, the amount of flow of those rivers depends, of course, upon the annual rainfall, but, as I have said, the annual rainfall in this section of the country varies from 125 to 130 inches per annum.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Is it not a fact that the amount of water permitted to pass into the canal is absolutely limited by the controlling works at what is known as the "Gamboa dam?"

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all, Mr. President. At the Gamboa dam they undertake to control the waters of the Chagres River, and propose to allow 15,000 cubic feet per second to flow into the canal during the flood tide. That relates only to that river.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I am speaking of the Chagres River. That was the river of which the Senator was speaking at the time.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator misunderstood me. I said to the Senator from Ohio that there were a number of other rivers that will flow unobstructed into the canal. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers propose, as I will show later, to construct a dam at Gamboa to control the waters of the Chagres River, but in doing that, during the rainy season, they plan to let 15,000 cubic feet per second pass into the canal. These other rivers will aggregate nearly as much more. So that during portions of the rainy season there will be from twenty-six to thirty thousand cubic feet of water that will be flowing into the canal at different points and at different elevations, all the way from 13 feet above sea level to 160 feet.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Do I understand the Senator to say that these rivers flowing into the canal are not treated of in a way satisfactory to the minority?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly. There are seventeen of the twenty-six rivers for which no provision has been made at all in the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator permit me to make a statement from the record?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. KITTREDGE. As a matter of fact, the point now suggested by the Senator from Illinois is not raised by the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. On the contrary, Mr. Noble, in his testimony before the committee, page 445 of the record, stated that the treatment of these tributary streams as proposed by the majority was adequate and satisfactory. I read just one question and answer upon that point:

> Senator KITTREDGE. I understand that you think that has been taken care of sufficiently by the majority?
> Mr. NOBLE. It looks so; yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not wish Senators to be misled by that testimony. That related to the Cano and a few other rivers, but it did not relate to the seventeen rivers that go unobstructed into the canal.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not be interrupted, I will say to the Senator. But I am willing to put my word against his upon that proposition, and I state without fear of successful contradiction that there are seventeen rivers or streams that cross and recross the proposed sea-level canal, which are unprovided for in the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. They do undertake to provide for the control of the Chagres River and for the Trinidad, the Gatun, the Gigante, the Cano, and one or two other rivers which I will notice in the course of this discussion.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not be interrupted further on that point.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Let me read one question and answer from the record.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not do that now. You have stated your proposition and I have stated mine.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I rely upon the record.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rely upon the proposition that there are seventeen streams unprovided for in the proposition of the majority of consulting engineers.

I have already called attention to the fact that in crossing the Isthmus with a sea-level canal that some provision must be made for twenty-six rivers of varying lengths and varying capacity. The largest and the most dangerous of all is the Chagres River. Those who favor the sea-level canal propose to control this river by the construction of a dam at Gamboa. I shall have occasion later to speak of this dam and its influence upon the waters of this great river. The other rivers that are proposed to be controlled by dams of varying lengths and height are the Giganti, Gigantito, and the Cano. These rivers and their tributaries are proposed to be controlled by four different dams. These, as I have said, I shall consider later in my remarks. I wish at this point to call attention to the fact that seventeen rivers, situated all the way from 13 to 160 feet above the canal prism, will discharge their waters unchecked by any obstruction into the sea-level canal. During the rainy season these streams have a very considerable body of water that will be carried into the canal, creating cross currents in the canal that will make it dangerous for navigation. These streams will also, especially during the rainy season, carry driftwood, silt, and other refuse matter into the canal. When you remember that there are only two or three feet between the keel of the larger ships and the bottom of the canal when it is cleanly dredged and no refuse matter in it at all, you can readily see that in the rainy season, with these seventeen streams, varying in height from 13 to 160 feet above the canal prism, as I have said, carrying into the canal trees, driftwood, silt, and refuse matter, it will create bars in the canal that will retard, if they do not completely block, the navigation of the canal during portions of the rainy season by the larger ships contemplated in the Spooner Act, unless a large force is kept constantly dredging the canal.

When Senators consider the curvature of the canal between the mouth of the Mindi River and Obispo, the narrow prism of the canal itself, and the fact that seventeen streams are unprovided for in the plan of the sea-level canal, the waters from streams which will flow from these various heights into the canal and make it a sluiceway to carry off any refuse matter that may be carried upon their waters, it would seem that the sea-level canal, as planned by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, must be rejected.

From Obispo to the duplicate tidal locks, while the width of the bottom of the canal is in most part 200 feet, in many respects it is nearly as dangerous as the navigation of the canal from Obispo to the terminus in Limon Bay. From Obispo to Sosa Hill the canal would be constructed through what is known as the "Culebra cut." Originally, from the top of Culebra cut to the bottom of a sea-level canal 40 feet below the sea level was a distance something over 370 feet. When the canal is constructed through Culebra cut there will be walls on either side from the bottom of the canal to a height of 206 feet. This is not sufficient to permit vessels of a larger type, either commercial or war vessels, to pass each other without stopping and tying up and occasion thereby great delay. Ships must also be navigated through this narrow prism of rock most carefully to avoid danger.

The great obstacle that engineers have found from the earliest time in constructing a sea-level canal across the Isthmus is in controlling the waters of the Chagres and the other rivers that, unless provided for, will flow into the sea-level canal and create such cross currents as will make navigation absolutely impossible. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers claim that this dangerous feature in the construction of a sea-level canal has been overcome by them by the construction of the dams that I have already mentioned and by diverting the channels of the Gatun River and the Trinidad and one or two other large streams to others that will carry them to the sea without approaching the sea-level canal. As I have already stated, the Chagres River is probably the most difficult and dangerous stream to properly and effectually control.

It takes its rise, as I have already said, in the San Blas Mountains, and drains a large section of country. It is a torrential river, and while at low water it has discharged at Gamboa as little as 400 cubic feet of water per second, in the rainy season this volume is increased in what would seem to us an unprecedented quantity. In the fall of 1879 it is estimated that this river discharged at Gamboa 76,000 cubic feet of water a second, and during the year 1885, 44,000 cubic feet a second, and at another time in the same year, 64,000 cubic feet a second. In 1890 it discharged at Gamboa during one of these rainy seasons 58,000 cubic feet a second, and again in 1890, 65,000 cubic feet a second; and in 1893, 43,000 cubic feet a second. These discharges continued for a period of nearly fifty hours. The floods have been known to follow each other rapidly. Unless this flood of water can be sucessfully controlled, all engineers who have studied this subject concede that a sea-level canal is an impossibility. In the plan that is proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers a dam is to be constructed at Gamboa of a size and capacity to control the waters of this torrential stream.

The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, in speaking of this great river, state that its general character above Bohio is that of a clear mountain stream and that the entire area drained above Gamboa by the river aggregates from 450 to 650 square miles. It is also stated that the watershed of the river above Gamboa is bold and high so that a heavy downfall of rain results in a rapid rise in the river. The country above Gamboa that is included in the reservoir when the dam is constructed at Gamboa is heavily wooded with a density of vegetation peculiar to a tropical country, and the conditions all favor varying stages of water in the river during the rainy season. At the point where the dam is proposed to be constructed, the river bed has an elevation of about 50 feet above mean sea level, and it is claimed from borings that have been made that rock is reached for the foundation of the dam at a maximum depth of about 54 feet. The dam that will be necessary to be constructed here will either be of masonry or a masonry cone covered with earth. It will be about 2,200 feet in length, about one-third of the length of the dam at Gatún, and will be 180 feet above mean sea level, or 130 feet above the river bed. It is estimated that this dam will create a lake above Gamboa nearly 20 miles in length. A spillway is provided for which, in flood time, will carry 15,000 cubic feet per second from this lake into the canal.

Mr. President, this dam is to be 50 feet higher than the dam at Gatun. It is nearly half a mile in length, and will have to withstand the pressure of the flow of water which, at times, is torrential in character. It must be remembered that in flood time as high as 76,000 cubic feet per second have passed over the place where it is proposed to construct and maintain this dam. Certainly, if this dam can be made to resist the pressure of water that will be against it during each period of the year, and then the added weight that will be thrown upon it during flood periods, it is safe to assume that the dam at Gatun, which will be placed upon an indurated clay foundation, which engineers claim is as good as any rock foundation, can sustain the weight of water which at no period of the year will rise as high as the water in Lake Gamboa. If this dam at Gamboa at any time should give way, it would destroy the use of the sea-level canal, or at least render it unsafe for use until the dam could be again constructed and successfully control the waters of the Chagres River.

What I regard, however, as much more dangerous to the integrity and successful operation of the sea-level canal are the dams suggested by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers for the control of the waters of the rivers Cano, Gigantito, and Rio Gigante. Unless the waters from these rivers are controlled by the dams suggested in the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, they will flow into the prism of the sea-level canal, and render the navigation dangerous if not impossible. At any rate, the flow of water from these rivers is so great at all seasons of the year, and especially during the rainy season, that the friends of the sea-level canal recognize the fact that provision must be made to keep the waters from those rivers from approaching or emptying into the canal. And hence provision is made for the construction of dams to throw those waters back upon their sources, and make them seek new outlets to the sea. The dam to close the waters of the Giganti will be 2,800 feet in length, more than one-half a mile, with a height above mean sea level of 75 feet. To control the waters of the Gigantito will require a dam 490 feet in length, with a height above the ground of 75 feet. And to control the waters of the River Caño a dam must be constructed 820 feet in length and 75 feet above the ground; and a dam must also be constructed 535 feet in length and 25 feet above the ground to close a depression in the rim of one of the lakes. Objection has been made by the friends of the sea-level canal to the dam at Gatun, because, among other reasons, it is claimed it has not a rock foundation; and yet in the construction of the proposed sea-level canal, here are four dams to be constructed with an aggregate length of 4,645 feet—nearly a mile in length—without any data upon which to base an estimate as to whether the dams can be constructed and maintained at the several places proposed.

The Senator from South Dakota in his speech the other day undertook to prove to the Senate that the dam at Gatun, with all the precautions that have been taken by the engineers who represent the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, was an unsafe dam; that it could not be constructed and maintained at that point. I want to ask him, or any Senator who has investigated the two reports that have been made or any of the testimony of any of the engineers who appeared before our committee, to state as to the amount and character of earth that is necessary to construct the four dams I have spoken of. No borings have been had at any of the points where it is proposed to construct these dams, as have been had at Gatun, to see how far it will be necessary to go to reach indurated clay or rock foundation. For aught we know, instead of going down 258 feet, as is required in one point in the construction of the Gatun dam, for the construction of these dams the Government may be required to go 300 feet below sea level before a rock foundation can be reached. It is purely a guess on the part of the engineers as to whether these dams can be built there easily and with safety. These streams, like the Chagres River, are torrential in character, and during the rainy season we have no data or other evidence that can satisfy us that these dams would not be carried away and carried into the sea-level canal by the force of the weight of the water that comes down the natural courses of these streams. These dams are not proposed to be of the gigantic proportions of the Gatun dam, and no precautions have been taken to provide against seepage or underground currents that might ultimately wash them away. It must be apparent, Mr. President, to all who are disinterested investigators of this great subject that the construction of a sea-level canal is encompassed with many dangers and obstacles so great that they seem almost, if not quite, impossibe to overcome. These dams, unless they can be constructed on as good foundations as the dam at Gatun and provision made for their safety of the character, at least, that is provided for in the Gatun dam, would be standing menaces to the successful operation of a sea-level canal. With a rainfall ranging from 100 to 125 inches per annum, it does not require any stretch of the imagination to understand that unless these dams can be located upon a foundation as good as indurated clay or rock, that they would be standing menaces to the successful and safe operation of a sea-level canal.

There is another consideration in connection with these streams that I desire to call, Mr. President, to the attention of the Senate, and that is this: If these dams can be successfully constructed at the points indicated on the map here they will throw the waters of these rivers back upon their sources and will drive them by the force of the depth of water that is created by the several dams to flow back and into the sources of the Trinidad River. The Trinidad River now flows into the Chagres River near Palo Hor Quito and near a point where the proposed sea-level canal crosses the Chagres River. It is proposed by the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers to provide for the waters of the Trinidad by having them flow to the sea through the bed of the Chagres River. With the augmented flow of water that would be found in this river by reason of forcing into it the waters from the Cano, the Giganti, and Gigantito, it might drive those waters into the sea-level canal at this point in the canal where it crosses the bed of the Chagres River. If it did not do that it would require an expenditure of a great deal of money to procure a new channel for this augmented flow of water to be safely carried to the sea. These conditions respecting the waters that must be cared for in the various rivers that are found on the Isthmus of Panama in order to construct and successfully operate a sea-level canal are what have frustrated the plans of all who have ever projected or undertaken to construct a sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama. De Lesseps, who is justly regarded as one of the greatest engineers of his age, after expending $260,000,000 in a vain effort to construct a sea-level canal was compelled to abandon the idea, and then a lock-level canal was undertaken.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers did not agree with the majority that the sea-level canal proposed by the majority was entirely practicable?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will answer that by asking if the majority did not say that the lock-level canal was a feasible plan?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I have not heard any expression from the majority on that subject.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. As the Senator from Illinois seems to be attacking the opinions of the engineers as to the sea-level canal, I should like him to be frank enough to state to the Senate that the minority of the Board agreed with the majority that the sea-level canal was not only practicable, but that the work could be done at the cost estimated.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that both boards of engineers, my understanding is, claim that either type of canal is feasible. But the one type will take more time and cost more money for its construction. The point I am making is that while the Senators who joined in the report here are criticising the Gatun dam and speaking about it not having a proper foundation, they come into the Senate and ask for the approval of their plan, when there is no evidence whatever as to the character of the foundation upon which these four dams must be constructed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. At the same time there is the evidence that the minority as well as the majority regard the plan of the majority as entirely practicable and feasible.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, Mr. President, not the plan of the majority; but that a sea-level canal is feasible nobody disputes.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. That particular sea-level canal.

Mr. HOPKINS. Nobody disputes that a sea-level canal can be constructed there. The point I shall reach later is that it can not be constructed within the time and for the amount of money that the American people are willing to give to it. But I am now speaking of the insufficient information upon which your committee come to the Senate and ask Senators to adopt the plan of the sea-level canal when those Senators are attacking the plan of a lock canal.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I wish merely that the Senate should understand and that the country should understand and that the Senator from Illinois should understand that in bringing in the majority report in favor of a sea-level canal we have the judgment not only of the majority of the engineers, but of all the engineers as to the practicability, the feasibility, and the safety of that particular sea-level canal.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no engineer on either side who has said that these dams can be constructed as outlined by the majority of the board of engineers.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Let me read a question and an answer from Mr. Noble, who is one of the minority.

Mr. HOPKINS. First let me read, and then I will let you read. I read from page 370 of the evidence, from Mr. William Barclay Parsons, one of the engineers who joined in the majority report, as to the question of the feasibility of the lock canal. Those Senators who present the majority report are contending that a lock canal is not feasible and that the dam can not be constructed and maintained at that point. That was the burden of the Senator's argument the other day. That is the position taken by the Senator from Florida. Now, what does his engineer say?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Mr. President——

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me read, and then I will yield:

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the other you have. That was the testimony of Saturday.

Mr. PARSONS. Saturday's testimony I had seen. Yesterday's testimony, of course, I had not seen.

Now, mark what Mr. Parsons says, and Parsons is one of the American engineers who favor the sea-level canal:

The minority plan, as the committee is aware, Senator, describes a canal with a summit level at 85 feet above mean sea level, reached by a flight of three locks on the Atlantic side, the three locks being placed in flight at Gatun; and reached from the Pacific side by two sets of locks, two locks in flight on the Pacific shore near Sosa and one at Pedro Miguel.

The plan that the minority has submitted is, in my judgment, a feasible scheme. It can be constructed; it can be constructed probably within the limit of cost and time that the minority has set forth. If it was to be regarded as simply a commercial enterprise by a private corporation that would have to go into the open market and risk its capital and pay for that capital 5 or 6 or possibly 4 per cent, when commissions and discounts are taken into consideration, and then
